Many supporters of the Government use the term "dropouts" when talking about young black people. These people are throwouts. They are certainly not dropouts. Society has rejected them; they have not rejected society. The Government have no right to talk about young black people being drop-outs. These are matters that we must understand if we are to overcome the resentment that produces hostility between black people and the police. We shall make progress in the building of confidence only if we understand the social implications.

The police must understand that it is their behaviour which prevents progress being made in the establishment of confidence. That is the lesson of Broadwater Farm. I hope that we shall put recent events behind us and return to some state of normality in the area. It is only the Minister of State who can ensure that that happens. He must sent the message down the line that we want a return to normality. The Tottenham people will respond because they want good policing. Like all others, they want the support of the police force. They suffer the same problems as anyone else and they will respond if normality returns to the area and the vanloads of policemen are taken away from the peripheral parts of the estate so that they are not seen to be present day in and day out, watching the estate for hours on end. If normality returns, the Minister will see the community's response.

Let us have some confidence in the community, and then let us expect the community to have some confidence in the police. The progress can begin if we learn the real lessons of the relationship between the community and the police, and understand the factors that led to everything going wrong. We could talk for a long time about some of the problems that have been set out in various reports. We have had the Scarman and Gifford reports, as well as the reports that the police have produced. The Metropolitan police must rid themselves of the fixed idea that law and order is exclusively dealing with public disorder. It is about a very different police relationship which is uppermost in the minds of the people. If that can be understood, we shall make some progress.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I should remind the House that only two hours remain and more than a dozen Back Benchers wish to catch my eye as well as those on the two Front Benches who will wish to reply to the debate.

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): On Wednesday there was a large advertisement in the London Standard seeking to attract recruits for London's 28 Territorial Army units. The advertisement reminded potential recruits that if they joined one of the 28 units they would have a clear and definite role in Britain's defence strategy. They were reminded also that the starting pay for a part-time recruit in London's TA would be £850 a year. I am not surprised that recruits are flocking to join London's 28 TA units, and that overall strength now stands at more than 10,000 men and women.

Compare that with the sorry state of the Metropolitan Special Constabulary, as recorded on page 26 of the Commissioner's admirable report. The strength of London's TA is 10,000 and growing but the special constabulary has a mere 1,560 officers, and is shrinking. Why should the disparity be so great? The Territorial Army and the special constabulary are looking for the same sort of fit, intelligent, and public-spirited young person who wants something more than a quiet life. The Territorial Army's role with the British Army of the Rhine is important, but helping to deter crime and protect our neighbours is also important.

It is discouraging that the decrease occurs at a time when we have a commissioner who is exceptionally keen on community involvement. He has set up a plethora of consultative panels and advisory groups. The development of neighbourhood watch schemes is beginning to make a real contribution. In my area, in 1985, home burglaries decreased by 22 per cent. If special constables are to languish under Sir Kenneth Newman's regime, something must be wrong.

We could use six times as many special constables in London as there are at present. If it is right to have 10,000 reserve soldiers in London, it makes even more sense to have more than 10,000 reserve policemen. It is clear that, under the present regime, we have no chance of getting them. I ask the Home Secretary to set up a wide-ranging review into the special constabulary in London and throughout the country. The structure, remuneration and role of the special constabulary is not right. If the Home Secretary will not introduce such an inquiry, I hope that the Select Committee on Home Affairs will take up the matter.

It is worth remembering that the special constabulary provides important links with the ethnic community. The commissioner's report reminds us that 7·5 per cent. of the London Special Constabulary is drawn from Afro-West Indian and Asian communities—a far higher proportion than in the regular force.

After the riots in Tottenham and Brixton, the doctrines associated with the name of Lord Scarman have come under critical scrutiny. If there has to be a clash between the softly, softly approach and those who would carry a big stick, I must side unreservedly with those who are in favour of introducing the longer baton. However, longer batons and better shields are not the complete solution to the policing problem. There must be every sort of contact —official and unofficial, orthodox and unorthodox— between the Metropolitan police and the West Indian community. I believe that the specials have an important role to play in this.

Appendix 5XV lists the honours and awards given to the Metropolitan police during 1985. I note with pleasure, and some surprise, that the commissioner has become a Grand Officer of the Order of the Lion of Malawi. There are eight Queen's medals for distinguished service. There are, very properly, six awards of the Victorian order or medal for personal service to the royal family. Last year, officers of the Metropolitan police received one CBE, two OBEs, three MBEs and 14 British Empire medals. An ordinary Civil Service Department, such as the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, would consider that a pretty poor crop of honours in a wet year; yet we expect much more from our police force than our ordinary Civil Service. The police deserve our support and more public recognition.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): The debate takes place against a background of far too high a level of crime, burglary, vandalism, robbery and assault in the metropolitan area. Although in my area of Islington there was a small reduction in reported crime in 1985, it was too small and came too late. That reduction is set against a continuing increase in other forms of crime and the fears of many people, especially in inner London.

Appendix 2 to the recently published report of the Comptroller and Auditor General on the financial control and accountability of the Metropolitan police contains a remarkable and extremely worrying breakdown of police time. A staggering 33 per cent. of police time appears to be spent off duty on annual and weekly leave, time off, bank holidays, and so on. Although police officers are clearly entitled to proper holidays and leave entitlement, 33 per cent. of their duty time is a staggering, inexplicable percentage.

It is especially worrying when compared with the proportion of time spent on street duties, which include not only foot patrols and home beats but car beats. Street duties take up only 29 per cent. of the time of police constables, which is far too low a percentage. The most important job that a police constable can possibly do is patrolling the streets on foot in uniform, making many London residents feel more secure, safer and less fearful about the level of crime. The police should be doing that. I am concerned that the figures in the report do not give us much confidence that those tasks are a major priority in the police force.

Good policing depends on the police not only being visible on our streets and estates but having the confidence of the community which they are there to serve. The present lack of accountability and democracy in the control of the Metropolitan police is of great concern. I serve with pleasure and pride on the Islington police consultative committee, as do members of the local authority. That forum enables a discussion, which is often useful, to take place with the police. It is no substitute for the sort of democratic control which ought to be exercised over the general policing priorities of London. That is not available to the people of London at the moment other than in a hasty and rushed debate of this kind in the House, which really offers no genuine control or accountability.

[Mr. Chris Smith]

It is not only on that wider level that accountability is required; it is on a much smaller scale as well. An estate in my constituency, the Barnsbury estate, had for many years been subject to a lot of vandalism, a number of teenage gangs roaming the estate and a fear of crime among the tenants. Because of an initiative from the tenants themselves, they sat down, with local beat officers, the local police commander and representatives of the local council, and together they decided on the policing priorities for the area and on measures to improve crime prevention on the estate.

The result has been remarkable. People feel much safer on the Barnsbury estate than they did, not just because of the policing measures that have been undertaken, but because they feel that they have some degree of say in how their estate is being policed through the close consultation that is taking place. If that sort of consultation and democratic participation can happen on a small scale at estate level, surely it is a principle which can be expanded to cover wide communities. The Commissioner said, in a letter to The Guardian yesterday, how much importance he attributed to consultation, public involvement and the involvement of residents in the policing of their area. I am pleased that he pays tribute to that principle. I only wish that we saw a lot more of it in the structure of the Metropolitan police as a whole and on the streets at neighbourhood and estate level.

Part of the confidence which is necessary between a police force and the residents that it serves is a feeling that when things go wrong complaints can efficiently and effectively be sorted out. The House will recall that earlier this year there was considerable publicity about a particular incident in 1983 when five youngsters, my constituents, were assaulted as they were coming home near the Holloway road from a summer fair. I am pleased to note that progress is now being made in following up that incident. Committal proceedings of five officers of the Metropolitan police were held last week on that matter. I cannot comment further because of the sub judice rules of the House, but there is an important point to be made. I deeply regret that it was necessary to raise such an enormous public fuss before the matter was properly, effectively and efficiently investigated.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Popular): It is regrettable that there was need for such a fuss not only before the matter was investigated, but before the police could be induced to drop their deliberate cover-up of the offenders and their refusal to make known what they knew about the identity of the offenders.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend because that is the point I was about to make.

One of the major problems with the present system of investigating complaints about the conduct of police officers is that the body which does the investigating, not the body that decides to launch the investigation—the Police Complaints Authority — is almost entirely composed of serving police officers. Until we have a completely independent police complaints procedure the public will be badly served. They will have less confidence than they should about whether genuine complaints about particular activities of particular police officers will be properly and fully followed up.

There is one even more general point to be made. Far and away the best service that can be done for the people of London in the issues of crime and law and order is to improve dramatically the provision of crime prevention. The balance of priorities that the Government have had in that respect over the past six years makes grim reading. The forces of control—the police, the courts, and the mopping-up operation after the crime has occurred—have devoted an increase in funding of about 30 per cent. or 35 per cent. in real terms to those operations. What has happened to the forces of prevention—the provision of good housing and better lit streets, and safer estates, with entryphones, better design, new housing and safer doors? Those are the things that people desperately want, to prevent crime in their areas.

Provision for housing expenditure by local authorities has been cut by 70 per cent. in real terms in the past five years. That is the sort of priority that the Government attach to crime prevention. No amount of seminars at 10 Downing street with the Prime Minister, a few fiddles on insurance polices and perhaps a new lock for car doors, no amount of such discussion on the margin, will make a real difference to the realities of the lack of crime prevention policy under this Government. It is the basic issues of housing, street lighting, safe streets and neighbourhoods that people are desperately concerned about in London. I fear that they are not getting those things from the Government.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I intend to make a brief speech because I regret that I shall not be able to stay for the duration of the debate, owing to a prior engagement.

The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and all his senior officers have been doing a good job over the recent period covered in the report against the background of a difficult situation. We should pay tribute to them. The force goal set by the Commissioner for 1986-88 seems to be about right, and has the balance about right. The Commissioner was correct to say that a high priority should be given to the reduction of criminal opportunities via crime prevention of the sort mentioned by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), via public involvement, and via the neighbourhood watch schemes, of which there are an agreeably large number in my area of Wallington.

All the points that have been made about the importance of street patrols need to be underlined, as they were in paragraph 40 of the Commissioner's report. They are demonstrably a good way of allaying public fear, and public fear lies at the heart of the general unease about law and order.

The Commissioner was right to stress the priority to be given to the detection of specified offences. That is necessary, because it is one of the most cost-effective ways of deploying the police service, which will never be adequately staffed for all the tasks placed on it. The more minor but all too frequent offence of criminal damage needs to be given higher priority than is sometimes the case. I know that sometimes it is not as dramatic or traumatic as grievous offences such as those connected with robbery, murder, homicide and so on. None the less, it is a matter of considerable concern to constituents. It is worth paying increased attention to that.

From a cost-effective point of view, the evidence suggests that, in places where the police concentrate on organised crime, they can make a dramatic difference to the figures. It has been drawn to my attention by senior police officers that, for example, by concentrating on one criminal firm and eventually managing, through a process of enhanced detection and effort, to nail that firm, one sees the result in a fall, which is sometimes dramatic, in offences in that category in the subsequent period. If we measure such things in terms of clear-up rates and numbers of offences, we see that a concentration of resources on organised crime is absolutely necessary.

Thirdly, and more importantly, the force must use the manpower and resources at its disposal to the maximum efficiency. I should like the Metropolitan police to reach their full establishment because it is still slightly below the agreed level.

The problems of policing the capital were well set out in paragraph 58 of the Commissioner's report. Not enough police are allocated to cover the various aspects of policing in London to give the public confidence. I think of the rising crime figures and just as much of the factors which we have already covered by our debate, such as public disorder and time off for in-service training. That is vital as the needs change. I think also of the problems caused by sick leave. The figures for sick leave and holidays are remarkable.

We should lay greater stress on the deployment of police officers on street duty. We should make a determined effort to push up the proportion of on-duty officers engaged in such tasks so that the public feel reassured and so that the police achieve more effective results.

There is no doubt that a contribution can be made to the better use of resources by continuing civilianisation and, at the margin, by competitive tendering and by contracting out some services.

Huge problems remain for the Metropolitan police because of the cash limits system—I am tempted to say, the "quaint" cash limits system — and annuality. Recently, police pay was negotiated and a 7·5 per cent. increase was settled. At that time, the Treasury was set on a limit of 4 per cent. A total of 80 per cent. of Metropolitan police costs is for manpower. That causes enormous problems, even with maximum efficiency within the police service.

An illustration can be given of the difficulties caused by the Treasury's inflexible approach. Vital support can be given to officers in uniform by the professional, technical and scientific grades in the police service. They are caught in arrangements which do not allow the police service to bid differentially for such services, so people are lost to the service or are not attracted to it in sufficient numbers. That was made clear in a report published as long ago as 1984. The Home Office would do well to consider what can be done to rectify that.

My constituency falls within the Epsom police division. I pay tribute to the local divisional report by Chief Superintendent Sellar and his colleagues. They are right to give priority to better police intelligence and information. They could be helped by the use of a microcomputer and it is hoped to install that device in the near future.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that crime prevention is of major importance. The neighbourhood watch schemes have an important role. In my area, such schemes increased from six in April 1984 to 86 in December 1985.

A greater effort is needed to combat the drug menace. It is disturbing to discover that the drug menace is not confined to the core of the inner city. One might have associated it with Piccadilly circus, but it is spreading alarmingly to the suburbs. The police are right to give it high priority. The problem must be dealt with not only in an enforcement context, but in an educational context. Advertising must be frank and straightforward and the publicity material in schools, pubs and clubs must be effective.

My final point on the divisional report is the great need for the police to be seen to be responding to the public's topical concerns. The public may not always be concerned about the same things as the gurus at Scotland Yard. Therefore, it is important for the latter to remember that. It is interesting that some of the matters that worry my constituents most are not the most serious crimes and, happily, not those reflected most in the criminal figures. They include vandalism, hooliganism and the alarming truancy rates in our inner cities, which in the worst cases are running at 30 per cent. or more. They worry about matters as prosaic as dangerous illegal parking. I hope that senior police officers will give sufficient attention to those matters which cause disproportionate concern to ordinary people.

The Government's approach in this important area must be firmly based on three priorities: on providing resources for more police, which is still necessary in the Metropolitan police force; to provide political support for more effective policing of the sort that I mentioned; and on providing the appropriate legislative framework—I have not had time to develop this today—to give the courts a range of judicial penalties for the convicted. In that context, I look forward to the Government's next instalment of criminal justice legislation which was foreshadowed in the recent White Paper.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar) I shall comment in a moment on something said earlier by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman).

The Home Secretary, in an opening speech made in his usual laid-back style, did not get the balance right between concern and complacency. It was a little silly of him to say that Londoners are better off than the people of New York. That is rather like saying that we should not worry about the fact that we have malaria, because we have not got AIDS. The traditions, the mode of life and the availability of firearms makes the problem in New York very different from that in London. New York is the only city in the world where a bank robber is likely to be mugged on the way to his getaway car. Its circumstances are different from those in London.

During his weighty speech, my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) contended that we are not using the Metropolitan police to the best possible effect because the Commissioner has not got right the relative priorities of the prevention and detection of crime and the use of the police in respect of public order. When my right hon. Friend said that, the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington intervened to say that the Commissioner is bound to provide police officers for that purpose. My right hon. Friend queried that and asked whether we should reconsider the proposition, instead of taking it for granted.

I can illustrate that point by recounting what I witnessed. It is topical, because it happened less than 24 hours ago. At two o'clock yesterday afternoon, I went to a green near the London hospital, Mile End, where there was an assembly—a not very large demonstration—in support of the gynaecologist Wendy Savage, about whom we have all read in the past day or two. On that green there were no more than a dozen or so men, but 200 or 300 women, a large proportion of whom were pushing baby buggies with small children in them. There were about 100 other walking children. Round the green were some senior police officers, several police officers on motor cycles and two coaches full of police officers.

Mr. Corbyn: Was there a helicopter as well?

Mr. Mikardo: No, there was no helicopter, but just down the road there was a riot control vehicle. I looked at these women with their little kids and then went to the officer in charge and said, "I don't think you've got enough of a police presence to deal with this dangerous mob and all the highly armed thugs that I see before me." He said, "Well, I've got 38 officers and I am deploying only 15 of them." However, I counted them and there were more police officers there than that.

So off we set. When we arrived at the London hospital, Whitechapel, which was the destination of those who were to hand in the letter, I left the march and stood on the pavement — I say this in all friendliness, not in a contumacious spirit; the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington could have been there—and all these people, nearly all of whom were women, went by carrying their home-made, handwritten placards.

Right at the end of the march there was a particular group of women who had been patients of Wendy Savage. She had delivered their babies. This fairly large group of women were pushing baby buggies with the aforesaid babies in them and immediately behind them, at the end of the procession, came a coachful of police officers. To my knowledge, the police officers had been sitting in that coach for several hours and had never left it.

Does the Minister of State think that that is an efficient use of police manpower? It might be a good way of providing a little overtime money for them. They all became used to earning a lot of overtime money during the miners' strike and they have to keep up with mortgages and all the rest of it. But does that not illustrate, in the clearest possible terms, the point that was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton — that the Commissioner and, I fear, Home Office Ministers have become—I hope that I do not do them an injustice—overwhelmingly obsessed by public order considerations. To a grossly undue extent, police manpower is being diverted to public order considerations and away from crime prevention and the identification of criminals.

I am sure that the Minister of State agrees that it has now become a truism that by themselves the police cannot prevent crime and bring criminals to justice. The Home Secretary referred to the help that the police receive from a number of organisations and voluntary agencies, but they need help from every citizen. They will be unable to clear up the crime wave unless they receive the full co-operation of all people. They will not receive it if people laugh at them. Opposite Whitechapel station yesterday afternoon a crowd of people were standing on the pavement and they were laughing their heads off at the spectacle of two coachloads of police following a lot of women with babies. Public confidence in the police is destroyed by a spectacle of that kind.

In particular, the confidence of the ethnic minorities in the police is low, and it is very sad that that should be so. Reference has been made to racist incidents and racist attacks. I agree that the definition that has been laid down and that was quoted by the Home Secretary is valuable and helpful, but the Minister of State knows, as I know only too well, that the number of racist incidents that are reported to the police is only the tip of the iceberg. A couple of dozen racist incidents a month are reported to the police in the London borough of Tower Hamlets. Hundreds more occur.

When one tries to find out why people do not report incidents to the police, one gets the answer—not only from black but from white people—"What is the point of reporting them to the police? They will not do anything about them anyway." I have evidence that that is not always true, but it is true often enough to create that impression in the minds of people, and to undermine the confidence of people in the police, and so in their eagerness to co-operate with the police that is so necessary if we are to get things improved.

I have been trying hard to do something about this. In Tower Hamlets, we have started a panel of representative people, of which I am the chairman, which meets every month and gets a list of racist incidents that have been reported to the police and information about what the police have done about it. We want it to get around the borough that people should report incidents to the police, because if they do, an independent panel is monitoring what action the police take, so that it cannot be said in the case of those incidents that are reported that nothing is done about them.

Unfortunately, this is very heavy going. It is hard to convince people that this is not merely a whitewashing exercise. I have been accused of running it as an exercise in whitewash, so deep is the gulf—we have to face it because it is a great problem for all of us—between the public and the police.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, (Mr. Smith) that we need a number of improvements to bridge that gulf. I put it to the last Home Secretary but two and to the Commissioner—they did not dispute it—that the great problem of the racist attitude of the Metropolitan police—I pay tribute to the fact that at the top and medium levels great efforts are being made to improve the situation—is not the odd policeman who talks about "nig-nogs" and looks upon them as lesser breeds without the law. Such a policeman is not a big problem. He is nasty, and gets up people's snouts. The big problem is that right through almost the whole of the force there is not the same commitment to protecting the interests of black people as there is to protecting the interests of white people.

As evidence of that, there are many more police recommendations to the victims of crime to take a private prosecution when the victims are black than when they are white. When the victim is black, the police try as hard as possible not to institute prosecutions themselves and to get the individual to do so. In some cases that is justified, but we still have to reflect on why it should be justified in all cases where the victim is black. I do not think that it can be.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury was right to say that there are two other elements at which we need to look if we are to increase public confidence in the police. The first is accountability; I agree with every word that he said about that. The second, with which I also agree, is that complaints against the police must be investigated independently. The present situation is a charade. I have a lot of hard evidence on this—I am not speaking on a hunch. I deliberately laid a complaint at the treatment that I received when I was arrested during the last general election campaign.

I have established a number of facts. First of all, at any point in the police complaints procedure at which there is a conflict of evidence between a civilian and a police officer, the Police Complaints Authority will always accepts as gospel the evidence given by the police officer. Second, the Police Complaints Authority will sometimes reach a conclusion on the basis of evidence that has not been disclosed to the complainant. The complainant has no opportunity to challenge its accuracy. Sometimes even the identity of the witness is not disclosed to the complainant. What sort of investigation is that? A third fact is that what my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Atkinson) called humiliating treatment by police of civilians is altogether ignored by the authority.

By way of a small personal note, I shall describe something that happened to me when I was arrested. I was in Bow road police station waiting to be transferred to Limehouse police station and I was in a room in which people who have been arrested are placed while waiting to be dealt with. In the room there was a long wooden bench which was narrow and hard. After I had sat on it for about 20 minutes, I got up to stretch my legs and to ease the pain on my bottom. The police officer in charge said, "Sit down." I said, "Why? Am I not allowed to stand?" He said, "No," and I said, "Why not?" He said, "Because I say so." I can understand that sort of thing happening in Moscow or in Santiago de Chile, or in Istanbul, which are in police states, but it should not happen here.

Mr. Tony Banks: It happens in this place. It sounds like Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mikardo: That officer was not a junior, yet he had no concept at all that he ought to have some sort of decent relationship with civilians. He certainly did not appreciate that his wages are paid by the public and that he was serving the people of his area. In his view, he was their boss and they had to do things because he said so.

If we are to create confidence we must get rid of that sort of attitude. We will not get rid of it until people know that, if they make a complaint, it will not be investigated by somebody whose first instinct is to whitewash a fellow officer.

The things I have spoken about are necessary to create confidence. This debate is useful and hon. Members have dealt with the subject in a practical way. I hope that the debate will make a contribution to creating that confidence.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): I see that several right hon. and hon. Members are still trying to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because they want to speak in this debate. Because of the rather limited time available, I hope that the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) will forgive me if I do not deal fully with all his points. His somewhat anecdotal account of what occurred in the police station is not typical. Certainly my constituents seldom complain to me about discourteous treatment in police stations.

Several hon. Members have spoken about the need to support the work of the Metropolitan police, and I am sure that that sentiment reflects the public will, because the police are there primarily to protect the public from the consequences of serious and major crime, especially crimes of violence such as murder, rape and manslaughter, and armed robbery with violence. The police also have to deal with traffic and drug offences and all other types of serious crime.

If the House means business on the support of the police, it must support the proposal of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, which he announced on Wednesday, to end the peremptory challenges of jurors in Crown courts. The work of the Metropolitan police in bringing major criminals to book is hampered and undermined since trial by jury in Crown courts is being systematically distorted, especially in multiple trials, by defence counsel leading to far too many acquittals of defendants who should be convicted. That relates directly to the role of the police in seeking to deal with major crime. It was clear on Wednesday that the House was divided on it. The need for action is misunderstood and it must be explained.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said that the selection of jurors was supposed to be based on random selection, but the systematic use of peremptory challenge distorts that and has the opposite effect. In Crown courts, each defendant can challenge three jurors without giving any reason. That is called the right to peremptory challenge. Thus, in a multiple trial with four defendants there can be 12 challenges and, with eight defendants, 24 challenges. Several defence counsel working together or independently can continue to challenge and remove jurors until they obtain a jury which is broadly to their liking.

What is now going on makes a mockery of the concept of a fair trial in a Crown court. Juries are supposed to be selected purely at random. Historically, the right to peremptory challenge exists to remove a bias on the part of an individual juror, It now does the opposite. It is being used to introduce a bias: a bias towards acquittal which is a distortion of the legal process.

The Times, in a leading article last June, said:

"A pin-striped suit, an old school or regimental tie, a prominantly displayed copy of the Daily Telegraph seem to provide a virtual guarantee that the bearer will be excluded from the jury".

Today, peremptory challenge seems to be used by defence counsel in an endeavour to achieve, as far as possible, a jury composed of people believed by the defence to be likely to be hostile to the prosecution and sympathetic to the defendant. The article concluded:

"the right to peremptory challenge . . . ought now to be abolished."

That is a view endorsed by Lord Denning in his book, "What Next in the Law", when he wrote:

"What is the justification today of the right of the accused to 'peremptory' challenges? Should we any longer permit the accused to exclude a juror simply because of his looks?"

[Mr. Toby Jessel]

He also wrote:

"It is now becoming apparent that the accused, by using the 'peremptory' challenge, may seek to 'pack' the jury-box with jurors who are sympathetic to his side."

It is equally wrong whether the juror is wearing a regimental tie, or has red hair or a black face to exclude him simply because of his appearance. It is a complete and absolute nonsense and it is right to stop it.

It is well known that in the Ponting case three jurors were removed by peremptory challenge and in the Cyprus secrets trial 12 jurors were removed by peremptory challenge. That must have been done by defence counsel in an endeavour to influence the outcome of the case. Otherwise, why should they have sought to do it? It is highly likely that, in some of those cases, it did influence the outcome. Therefore, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary should be warmly supported.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I promised my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) that I would say how sorry he is to miss the debate. Unfortunately, he is in hospital.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) spoke about the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. I should like to touch on what happens in police stations under the custody arrangements and the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme. I have no doubt that the provisions of that Act in that regard, along with the attendance of a solicitor at the police station, have had a fairly dramatic effect on how people are treated in custody.

Despite what we may say about that Act, there seems little doubt that that arrangement will be changed. There is now a degree of professionalism in the custody of prisoners that was unknown before. There is a clear line of responsibility. I accept that the well-trained senior officers come under pressure when there are mass arrests, but probably as a result of those arrangements some people will now be acquitted or not even charged even though they might have been convicted before. Equally, there is much less likelihood of confessions being challenged, because arrangements are now much more professional.

However, the new arrangements mean that some police officers are more involved in the judicial process than in law enforcement and detection. The Home Office should recognise that that puts an additional strain on police manpower. Those engaged in the arrangements resulting from the Police and Criminal Evidence Act should be replaced by policemen who can go on the beat.

The recruitment of black police officers has been a constant theme since I have been a Member of Parliament. I have no doubt that London's police force would be richer and more effective, and would receive more co-operation and support from the public, if it contained more black and ethnic minority members. I shall give a simple illustration. Someone going to see the ballet "Giselle" at the Colosseum would find that most of the audience was white. Someone going to see a performance of "Giselle" put on by the Dance Theatre of Harlem would find that a large proportion of the audience was black. There is only one distinction to be drawn between the performances, and that is that one is performed almost entirely by black dancers while the other is performed almost entirely by white dancers. However, that makes an enormous difference to those who attend and support those performances.

That is a simple illustration of how people identify with the colour of those engaged in a particular service or activity. I very much welcome the efforts that have been made in Brixton by our community liaison officer, Mr. Buchan, and his assistant Mr. Crowe. They have a personalised and intimate method of recruiting black officers, and work very hard at it. I very much welcome their work, although I do not think that it would be helpful to outline what they are doing in detail. Nevertheless, I am sure that everybody would support them. After all, it would be foolish to underestimate the hostility and distrust that still exist among members of the black community of all ages. Only last night, someone said to me, "They didn't want us in the 1960s, but now they are looking for us in the 1980s." The backlog of distrust and hostility should not be underestimated, and I very much welcome the efforts that are being made in that respect.

Last September, there was a riot in Brixton. I shall not say much about it, as I spoke in the debate on it last October. But we recovered from it at a remarkable speed. That speed of recovery is a tribute to the efforts that have been made to obtain more communication and liaison between the police and the community. We should put our money and effort into that. If one person had been killed by a plastic bullet during that riot, it would not have been possible to make the speedy recovery. If the police have to claim superiority in arms and weapons, they have lost the battle.

I went to Brixton police station a couple of days ago. I visit it regularly to learn what is happening and to update myself. As the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) said, 11 teams of police officers are working on nine murders, one shooting and one multiple rape. Within the past few weeks four old-age pensioners have been strangled or otherwise killed in their own homes. One of them was a prominent member of a tennis association in my own constituency.

Within the comparatively small area that is covered by the Brixton division—I have the maps and the figures—it is not unusual to find 500 or 600 robberies in one quarter of one division of my constituency, or to find vehicle crimes rising to 1,500 a year in one quarter of a division. Burglaries are running at about 1,000 in one quarter of a division. The crime figures for the first quarter of the year show that in Lambeth we have the highest level of crime anywhere in London apart from Westminster, where there is a high level of theft in the west end. These crimes are committed largely against poor people, vulnerable people and those who generally are least able to defend themselves.

Everyone has a responsibility, whether as a Member for Parliament, a trade unionist, a councillor or in any other capacity, to defend the civil rights of others not to be assaulted, robbed or murdered, and to play as constructive a part as he can in the battle to preserve people's rights. That does not mean uncritical support for the police. Of course, what is regarded as criticism in one area is often regarded in another as a constructive contribution to the debate on policing. Accountability is important but it is not a substitute for consultation. Neither accountability nor consultation is a substitute for responsibility.

The police manpower that Brixton has been supplied with is inadequate to cope with the task in hand. If manpower is measured against the level of crime instead of population, it is at far too low a level in Brixton. About four times as many crimes take place in Lambeth than in Sutton, yet the distrbution of manpower between the two districts is not substantially different. I ask the Government to devote more resources on the basis of the level of crime rather than on the population criteria.

As we are short of time, there is no chance to develop these arguments. I wish to emphasise, however, that it is no good asking the police to deal with the harvest of seven years of Tory cuts and Tory assaults on the British people in terms of housing, unemployment and poverty. That is an issue to which I hope we can return in future. The Government are making a great mistake if they believe that the police should pick up the bill for the gross neglect of many in responsible positions.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): As part of a self-denying ordinance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall speak for only five minutes.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) talked about his approval of the Home Secretary's suggestion of disallowing the challenge of jurors. He reminded me of a comment, which I thought was most out of place, made by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvells), who is known to us all. The hon. Member for Leicester, East said recently that the acquittal rate at Snaresbrook Crown court — it is the Crown court nearest to my constituency — is due to the fact that its juries are made up of the lower working classes and housewives. He said that he would prefer to have on juries more middle-class people and business men. If the right to challenge jurors is lost, we shall lose the more representative juries that are more responsive to those who come before them. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Twickenham for giving me an opportunity to have a smash at the hon. Member for Leicester, East.

I shall turn to the unrepresentative nature of the police force. Hon. Members have referred, quite properly, to the number of black and Asian people in the police force and the need to increase that number. We are glad that the number has increased. Women are very much under-represented at all levels of the police force, especially at officer level. Only one woman in 32 is at commander level, and none is above that. I am aware that the Metropolitan police force is considering that, especially in front-line police activity. The experiment so far has amounted to putting women in the front-line and seeing how they compare with their male counterparts, in the narrowest sense of the word. A female superintendent who was refused promotion 12 times out of 13 by all-male promotion boards believes:

"Macho policemen set the wrong tone, are insensitive to people, and inadvertently provoke fights and assaults."

She added:

"The violence of the police at Wapping was totally unnecessary. If you gave me a team of women I had specially trained, I could keep the peace, offer no provocation and keep tempers cool."

Mr. Tony Banks: Make her the Commissioner.

Ms. Richardson: I was not going to propose that. The police force fails to prioritise those aspects of policing which are more reflective of what the community needs. The police strategy also fails to consider the people who are being policed, in the sense that many of them are women. Women have specific needs in cities. Statistically, women are less likely to be attacked than men. I found the figures quite surprising.

However, the fear of attack on the part of women is much greater. One in 10 women in inner London will not go out at night. I should put it the other way round and say that most men should not go out at night, so that women are able to walk the streets in peace. In Balham, 92 per cent. of women do not feel safe walking at night, but a third do not feel safe going out during the day. That is even worse. Women are increasingly at risk due to cuts in public transport. Only half as many women as men can drive or have access to cars.

In the period 1979-84, the amount of violent incidents against women increased dramatically. Offences recorded by the Metropolitan police against the person rose by 22 per cent., rape by 48 per cent., and robbery by 96 per cent. The reality is fast catching up with the perception.

When women are on the receiving end of the police, they seem to suffer a particular form of intimidation. Memories of the miners' strike are still with us, when a woman was forced to "confess" because her screaming baby was deliberately kept in a room next to her to make her more frightened and concerned. Following Broadwater Farm, a woman was asked by police if she was having sex in a photograph they had taken of her. Another was strip searched. Another was called a prostitute, while the police threatened other women with reprisals against their children. We must see that in the context of police strategy.

I beg the Minister of State, when he replies, to give some assurance that there will be some lead from the Home Office in terms of ensuring that the police force is more representative and that there are more women in it. We are glad that there are to be more police officers. Those men and women—black and white—must be put out on the beat and not employed to use plastic bullets and cannons.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The first of the Front Bench speakers hopes to catch my eye at 2.5 pm. I appeal for brevity, because I should like all those hon. Members who wish to speak to be able to do so.

1.39 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I shall try to be as brief as possible, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This debate is a travesty of justice and democracy. Once a year, we are allowed five hours—if the Common Market debate does not intervene — to debate the policing of London. No vote is taken at the end of the debate. There is no detailed discussion of the police budget. We are not able to cross-examine the Minister concerned about the policing strategy for London. After all, he is the police authority for London. This is disgraceful.

I question the idea that we have this unaccountable, unelected body that runs policing in London. This perpetuates claims from the Home Office that we have no national police force in London; yet the role of the National Reporting Centre is barely mentioned in the Commissioner's report or in any other report. However, during the miners' strike, at least 7,000 police were at the disposal of the Home Office to be moved willy-nilly around the country. I am certain that, before long, police from outside London will be brought into Wapping, if they are not already there, through the National Reporting Centre.

I am disturbed by the parrot cry of Conservative Members that demonstrations in London cost a lot of money and should not be held. They say that Labour Members should do their best to persuade people not to demonstrate. Are Conservative Members really advocating the curtailment of the right to protest, demonstrate and march? They continually use costings in relation to the number of police at these demonstrations. How much money will be spent next Wednesday, when, I understand, a wedding is to take place? Are there any complaints about that? Of course there are not, but there are complaints about the legitimate right to complain about apartheid, the Wapping dispute, and so on.

I have had long experience of policing in London as a councillor in Haringey and now as a Member of Parliament for Islington. A thorough crime survey was carried out in Islington. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) referred to that survey, which revealed some disturbing features. It reflected—this is of primary importance—the fear of a large number of women who are afraid to go out on the streets at night, as my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) said, and often too afraid to go out in the day because of the threat of sexual or racial attack or, in the case of black women, a combination of both.

There is serious under-reporting of sexual harassment and crimes. We believe that often as few as half of the crimes that take place are reported. In some cases, the proportion is even less. Under-reporting of racial attacks and problems is even greater. The police in Islington have told me that, this year, the number of reported racial crimes has increased although they believe — agreeing substantially with the points made in the survey—that the number is much lower than the number of crimes that take place. In the context of high crime rates, attacks on the person, invasion of privacy, robbery and burglary, that is a serious picture.

The police must recognise also—policing policy must direct itself to this — the social background against which we approach the problems of high unemployment and the high degree of social alienation, especially of young people. I urge the Home Secretary to read thoroughly and carefully Lord Gifford's report on the Broadwater Farm incident and all that went with it. I was disappointed that the right hon. Gentleman did not refer more to that report, which is well written, well produced and well researched. It was disgraceful that the police refused to take part in Lord Gifford's inquiry and that the Home Office refused to present evidence directly to it. The Home Secretary may smile, but it was a thorough report and I hope that he will look carefully into it.

The Broadwater Farm estate is an area of very high unemployment and severe poverty. About 35 per cent. of households have annual incomes of less than £3,000 a year, and only 2 per cent. have incomes of more than £15,000 a year. I suspect that many of us could refer to similar examples of inner-city deprivation in our constituencies. Of those who expressed concern about the area, 94 per cent. said that unemployment was the main problem, 42 per cent. blamed housing, 29 per cent. blamed police behaviour, and so on down the line. Those are far worse figures than one would find in any other comparative survey taken in individual parts of London.

When the Government give what I hope will be a serious response to Lord Gifford's inquiry, I hope that they will recognise that what has to be addressed is partly policing, partly control of the police, partly the amount of money that can be spent on housing in an area, partly the design of housing but, above all, the social and economic environment in which the Broadwater Farm riots took place.

I come to the issue of policing policy in London as a whole. We have a process of high capital spending on the police and a highly mobile and technical police force that is increasingly not responding to the worries and wishes of the community and is not available to deal with those worries and wishes. In my constituency we are seeing an increase in problems of racial harassment which have been much worse in other parts of London up to now. We have problems in some schools where Bengali and other Asian children have been harassed on their way home from school and have to be escorted from the school to their home. We have an increasingly serious problem of racism and racial violence in London.

I believe that the Home Office figures and the Metropolitan police figures seriously understate the importance of these matters, and I hope that when the Minister replies he will give us some inkling about the policies he proposes to eradicate racial violence in London and ensure that the police treat these matters seriously so that people are prepared to report racial crimes to the police because they believe that something will be done about them.

I hope that in future years we will have a longer debate on the policing of London and above all I hope that in the future we will see an elected police authority for London which is seriously accountable to the people in London and we do not have to use the process of an Adjournment debate in the House once a year.

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): We are today considering the report of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and the review of public order. I want to say a few words about what the role of the police should be. We have heard about what the role is and we have heard from my hon. Friends about the considerable number of problems that arise as a result of the lack of proper policing in London. I understand that the role of the police is to see that the law is enforced. It should also be for the defence of democracy and freedom in this country and to defend the rights of the common people.

Many problems face the police. That is quite clear from the Commissioner's report to the House. Reference has recently been made to the fact that there are about 3·5 million offences each year. Of the offences mentioned in the Commissioner's report, some 20,000 are concerned with violence. The so-called public order issues — in other words, victories which have been achieved — include the police victory against the miners, and police victories against the printers, hospital workers, nuclear protesters and others who have attempted to exercise their democratic rights in this country either as trade unionists or as citizens concerned with peace.

All that, and the many other problems that arise out of bad policing in this country, happen because of the philosophy of the Prime Minister and her Government. We have a competitive society in which people battle and victory goes to those who are strong and wealthy. Society has become more and more like a jungle as a result of the insistence upon a competitive society. I would rather we had a society based more on mutual aid and co-operation.

Hackney, the area I represent, has one of the highest crime rates. I notice from the figures produced that in the first quarter of this year some 7,417 crimes have been put on record. There has been a poor response to the citizens' call for aid from the police. A petition was presented to me last week, signed by over 100 home owners in one street. They complained about the lack of response from the Mare street police to their pleas of assistance because of the large number of offences that have been committed. That petition has been sent on to the Home Secretary.

On the other hand, there is over-policing of street demonstrations, during strikes and so on. I have had occasion to complain about that in the Hackney area, where there have been as many policemen as demonstrators walking through the streets. However, I was responsible for organising some 83,000 people in a demonstration proceeding from Trafalgar square to Victoria park in Hackney. There was not one incident and there was no trouble. The Home Secretary can look it up. Masses of police were not needed. Similarly, there was a demonstration of 100,000 people across to Brixton on the issue of Nazism. Again, there was no need for the masses of police put on to the streets for such events.

We need police on the streets, but we need them on the beat, where the people can see them, go to them and get their assistance. There is still far too much of the Starsky and Hutch approach by the police to policing in London.

There have been numerous cases of bad behaviour, which I have referred to various Home Secretaries over a period. All those complaints have led to a loss of public support. For example, that loss of public support is shown in Hackney, where a pamphlet called "Police out of School" has been produced because of the bad relations that have developed between the public and the police. The teachers have had to take a stand on the matter so that attention may be drawn to it.

All those problems cannot be solved by introducing so-called new weapons, whether water cannon, gas, plastic bullets, flails or armoured vehicles. What is needed is co-operation between the police and the local authorities. The Commissioner has refused co-operation with Hackney borough council's police committee. All political parties on the council and all ethnic groups are represented on that committee. I have a letter from the commander of the police dated 8 October 1985—the last letter I received—saying:

"a period of calm must prevail before we return to the vital task of setting up a Consultative Group for Hackney . . . I will write to you again shortly".

There is no consultative committee, but Hackney borough council has set up a committee on which there should be consultation. The sooner that is done, the better. I urge the Home Secretary to give his authority to the local police to meet the Hackney borough council police committee so that they may look at the problems and see what can be done, on the basis of co-operation, to solve the crimes in that area.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): I shall not make the speech that I was going to make because there is not time. I am sure that my hon. Friends will be pleased to hear that. I shall restrict myself to one or two points. I am grateful to see the Home Secretary here because I want to say a word to him.

It is right and proper that we should debate these matters in the House. While on a deputation to Lord Whitelaw when he was Home Secretary, I asked that we should have an annual debate. I am pleased that we have it, but no one should think that it is sufficient or that it in any way constitutes the effective police accountability that we need. On their own, such debates are thoroughly unsatisfactory in providing proper scrutiny of the Metropolitan police.

The Police Federation sends us a copy of its monthly magazine. I am glad that it does. However, I am concerned at the apparent growing politicisation of the federation and the snide attacks on the Labour party in that magazine. It is no part of the sort of police force that we want for it to support one party rather than another, or to seek to influence policemen's voting behaviour. The federation should think carefully about its attitude and approach. At the moment it is in danger of doing itself a grave disservice by appearing to go down that road.

The police, like everybody else, should tremble before the ballot box and respect it. The same applies to Commissioner Newman. I want him to know that I resent his increasingly political statements. We do not think it proper for generals or admirals to sound off in that way, so senior policemen should not, either. Policemen, whatever their rank, should be careful not to give the impression that they consider themselves to be the handmaidens of the Conservative party.

Mr. Mikardo: The police are being brought into politics.

Mr. Leighton: The main criticism that my constituents make is of police ineffectiveness in dealing with crime. The growth of crime cannot be blamed on the police. The blame is more with the Government for creating the conditions in which crime can breed.

The police clear-up rate in London is low. I receive complaints about that. Only one crime in five is cleared up. My constituents tell me that they do not think it worth reporting crime because it is a waste of time. They have great difficulty finding a policeman when they need one.

I am worried that the police force is being turned into a paramilitary force. The Commissioner is ordering armoured cars and looking at water cannon. We are all fond of our friendly neighbourhood bobby, but if, next time we meet him, he has a NATO helmet on his head, a visor so that we cannot see his face, carries a shield, waves a drawn truncheon, has a belt full of plastic bullets round his waist, a canister of CS gas strapped to his back, and is mouthing obscenities, we might look at him differently.

I am particularly against paramilitary policing because I have experienced it personally. I was on the receiving end of it on the evening of 3 May at Wapping. I was shocked and appalled at what I saw. I have still not recovered from the experience. It is difficult for me to look at the police in the same way.

I brought a deputation to see the Minister of State about that occasion. I have been forced to a number of conclusions. If there is supposed to be accountability, as a parliamentarian I believe that it is here in the House that we are entitled to say what we think. I shall not have time to justify the conclusions I have drawn, but I shall do that on another occasion.

The first is that the notion that there is some sort of democratic accountability for the Metropolitan police through the Home Secretary to the House is a myth and a farce. Secondly, Ministers have very little idea of what goes on in our streets. Thirdly, senior police officers are not really answerable to anyone. Fourthly, policemen have shown that they can act outside the law and get away with it. Often when things go wrong no one is called to account; no one has to justify actions or apologise.

Fifthly, the police proved on 3 May that they are, in the strictest meaning of the word, irresponsible, and that on occasions they can do what they like. That is intolerable and cannot be allowed to continue. When I have the chance I shall justify those statements.

I have two other comments to make — one to the Home Secretary and the other to Assistant Commissioner Wynn-Jones. I do not know what the Assistant Commissioner does to justify the huge salary that the taxpayer provides. His main role seems to be minister of propaganda for the Metropolitan police. His main contribution is in the black art of manipulating the media. He held a press conference after the events of 3 May. I read what he said and I was astonished. I could not believe that he was talking about the same event that I had witnessed. I asked where he was between 10.30 and midnight. I was told that he was in Leman street police station. He was not an eye witness. He had seen nothing. I was there and did see.

On 8 May we had a debate in which my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who was also an eye witness of the events, gave an account of what happened. It was an accurate account. I notice the Home Secretary sitting there with a look of incredulity on his face. He started to laugh, as I saw him laughing earlier this morning. Then, with a fatuous, supercilious gesture, he ostentatiously walked out, as though to say, "That is complete nonsense. It cannot be true." He did not believe it. His duty as Home Secretary, when a Privy Councillor was explaining what happened, was to sit and listen. He must not be a Home Secretary who does not want to know and who is not prepared to have such democratic accountability. It is intolerable. We must get some democracy into this.

Mr. Hurd rose——

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is being absurd.

Mr. Banks: I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) had sat down.

Mr. Hurd: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was giving me the opportunity to speak. What I found so strange on that occasion was that the account given by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) differed so substantially from the account that we heard a few minutes earlier from the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley).

Mr. Banks: It did not.

Mr. Hurd: Hansard shows that it did. Any account by an eye witness to those events and any complaints deserve to be and will be thoroughly investigated and set against the accounts of other witnesses.

2.1 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I endorse word for word the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton). I was also present on 3 May and confirm that my hon. Friend's account was absolutely correct, as was the account given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), which in no way differed, as I heard it, from the account of my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley).

I will be briefest of all. This demonstrates how pathetic and miserable is the suggestion that somehow London Members of Parliament exercise, through the House, accountability over the Metropolitan police. Two Ministers are present. Neither the Home Secretary nor the Minister of State comes from London. I know that we are not supposed to recognise people sitting outside the Chamber, but one person whom I would have liked to have seen today would have looked remarkably like the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. But he is not here. What is more, I do not suppose that he even bothers to take account of the serious fears expressed by the Opposition.

Mr. Corbyn: Does he read Hansard?

Mr. Banks: Why should he? We do not hold the police accountable.

Statistically, London has the most inefficient police force in the country and the most expensive. We do not get value for money — a term that Conservative Members appreciate — from the services of the Metropolitan police. For the police to continue to amplify public order offences on television while ignoring or under-playing the burglaries and the street crime which really worries people in London is disgraceful. I do not know how the Commissioner thinks that he will clear up burglaries in Newham with water cannon and plastic bullets. But the people of Newham want those crimes cleared up. Yet an hon. Member such as myself, trying to represent his constituents, is reduced to a pathetic two minutes in a miserable half-day debate on policing in London.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I confirm that the Home Secretary's remarks were incorrect. Hansard will show clearly that my remarks fitted in with what my right hon. and hon. Friends said. I limited myself to what I saw that night.

It is true, as several of my hon. Friends have said, that the debate has shown the inadequacy of accountability. It is one reason why the next Labour Government, in about 18 months' time, will introduce a proper system of accountability for the Metropolitan police and for other police forces.

In 1979, the Government said that they would get tough on law and order. If anyone had said at the time that during the following six years there would be riots on the streets of London, that police officers would be injured, and in one case killed, that police officers would be shot at with guns, that the crime rate would increase by 41 per cent. between 1978 and now, and that we would be pleased at the improvement of the clear-up rate from 17 per cent. to 18 per cent., he would have been regarded as extremely alarmist. If he had gone on to say that in a written answer to this House the Home Secretary would slip through an announcement that police forces in London were to have 24 armoured personnel carriers, another 100 vehicles for carrying members of the police force around London and 2½ ft long truncheons, people would have said that he was stark, staring mad. But all that has happened during the last six years of this Conservative Government.

The Home Secretary said in his opening speech that the issue of these weapons has not changed policing. It has changed policing, and the tragedy is the policing has been changed in the last six years in a way that, prior to 1979, nobody in this country would have believed possible. The Government thought that they could make law and order a party political issue on which they would win, and that they could deal with the problem of law and order by getting tough again. But getting tough has no effect whatsoever on the country's crime rate. What has an effect is the collapse of the community. The Government have failed to take into account the fact that the social and economic policies that they have pursued have resulted in an already dangerous and difficult situation in our inner cities being made profoundly worse. The community has become increasingly fractured by the Government's policies.

To try to deal with the problem by increasing the number of police officers, by arming the police and by giving them different types of weapons is not the answer. The police are beginning to recognise that, although not, frankly, with the force and urgency that is needed by some of them, if they are to return to the kind of policing that most of them want.

I ask the Home Secretary to take away the Broadwater Farm report and read it and to ask the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to read it. It contains many important messages. The first is a quotation from the Commissioner's public order review. He said:

"In 1981 the tenants' association"—

he was referring to the Broadwater Farm—

"on the estate asked the police to open a police office to help combat the rising crime rate and to reduce the anxiety felt by many residents about their safety. This move was not altogether welcome by young black residents, and was seen by them as constituting an oppressive presence on the estate."

The implication in that quotation is immensely damaging. It implies that young blacks did not want something to be done about crime. The Broadwater Farm report, the Islington report, even the Police Studies Institute study, to some extent, the Merseyside report and a number of other reports all show that, regardless of age, sex or ethnic background, people have the same anxieties about crime. Young blacks on the Broadwater Farm estate were desperately anxious about crime and wanted something effective to be done about it. But that is not what was done.

The Commissioner ignores what is pointed out on page 204 of the Broadwater Farm report, where there is a reference to a parliamentary answer in the House of Lords. The question was about how many stops and searches were carried out in the Tottenham area in 1985. The answer was that "in the first three months there were 867 stops resulting in 175 arrests; and in the last nine months there were 413 searches followed by 51 arrests."

It must be noted that the answer refers to arrests, not to convictions. The Merseyside report, the PSI study and a number of other reports show that the clear-up rate in the case of stop and search and the search of people's homes is abysmally low. A number of my hon. Friends have emphasised that all that that does is to alienate many innocent people who want to go about their normal lives without interference. That is what is so profoundly wrong.

On page 24 of his report "A Police for the People" the Commissioner says that he is worried about the disaffection of young people. He is right to be worried. The trouble is that he does not go on to ask why they are disaffected. He goes on to say what he is trying to do about it. The tragedy is that what he is trying to do is inadequate. He lists football matches with youngsters, visits to schools, dances, visits to zoos and one or two other such items. Nowhere is there anything about the problem of racism in the police force, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) referred. Nowhere is there a comment on the effects of stop and search in the street when it is carried out inappropriately on the people of an area. That missing part is vital.

There is something sad about a report that is written in the language of American sociology and management jargon in the 1960s. I am not a sociologist, but I know that that period of sociology did more damage to the reputation of sociology than anything else. It was often tautological in its arguments. However, the language is used again in the report, which talks about "the system" as though human beings were not part of it. The trouble is that human beings are central to policing. The most important point that is not addressed is that about the relationship between police officers and the community. The Commissioner refers to that occasionally, but the depth of thought that he has given to it is not good enough.

The Home Secretary said that he wanted to improve the number of police on the streets. I do not disagree with him, but that is not enough in its own right. There are dozens of police on Broadwater Farm, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Atkinson). That is not enough. The research done on Broadwater Farm shows that, again regardless of race, sex or age, there is the simple feeling that the police were not operating fairly and that young blacks were singled out for stop and search. It can be said that all those people are wrong and we should take no notice of them, and that all the surveys carried out are a load of nonsense that should be ignored. However, if we do not listen to the people, we are making trouble for ourselves in the inner cities. Both we and the police have a duty to listen to them, and that is one of the reasons why there should be a better system of accountability.

It is a matter not just of numbers in the street but of behaviour on the street. That is why training and experience are so important. However, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton said, the first thing that was cut as a result of training required under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act was the policing skills which the Commissioner has said are so vital. These skills are social skills such as the ability to cope with people in difficult situations, as the police are often asked to do. That training was only reintroduced in 1985 when the pressure of the other training reduced. There is a desperate need to do much more on experience and training.

Again, that makes the case for effective accountability, because we are talking about priorities. Whichever survey one reads, it is pointed out that people, regardless of age, sex or ethnic origin, say that their main priorities for police action are burglary, street robbery, drunken driving, heroin and drugs, and sexual and racial assault. However, the priorites of individual police officers are often different. That is one of the problems. Police officers say that they know what the people in the area want, but they are wrong. They are not wicked, bad or incompetent, but they have made a misjudgment. That misjudgment gets them into difficulties. Curiously, it gets even more out of control without effective accountability.

On page 37 of his report, the Commissioner says that the lorry ban and the ban on parking on footpaths, both issues of considerable importance to the people of London, as has been made clear, are things to which he cannot give high priority, given the other problems facing him. At one level that is true, in the sense that the six priorities that I set out are important, but it is also clear that the bans would be given priority by those who had to answer to the public. The Metropolitan Commissioner of Police does not have to answer to them except through the Home Secretary in this inadequate debate.

Some 5,500 people are killed in England and Wales each year as a result of road traffic accidents. The figure for London is 500, although I am going on memory there. That is a matter which worries people and it is the sort of thing that we should be debating. We should be debating the priorities, but that is precisely what we cannot do effectively in a debate of this nature.

Finally, I should like to return to the matter of crime prevention. The Government have failed to recognise that they cannot cope with the rise in crime unless they do something to heal the fracturing of our communities, especially the communities in our inner cities and people involved in industrial disputes who are frightened about their jobs and their economic future.

Neighbourhood policing sometimes works well because the community is already functioning well and community policing adds to it. It can be a useful innovation where one is trying to build up a community, but it cannot work well and can only be at best a third or fourth alternative where the community is so fractured that people cannot be brought together in an effective way to prevent crime. People put on strong doors and strong locks and retreat and do not go out if they hear a noise or something frightening. The Government are not facing that and if they think that they can get round it by giving people occasional grants of £50 to enable them to fit stronger doors they are merely ducking their responsibility for the cutbacks that they have imposed on the inner cities.

The Minister has a lot of questions to answer. I should like to add one further question of considerable importance about accountability. Since the May election new police committees have been formed by a number of local authorities. If the relevant local senior police officer wants to participate and co-operate with those committees, and if he recognises that the police will not be held accountable because that is not what the law is about, will he be allowed to do so? Above all, will he be encourged to do so? There is a suggestion that senior police officers, even when they want to co-operate to improve relations between local authorities and police, will not be allowed to do so. Can the Minister give us a clear and categorical assurance that any senior police officer of the relevant rank will be able to participate in the way that I have suggested? That would be a small step on the road to a better system of accountability.

2.13 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): The debate has covered a wide range of issues. I appreciate that a number of hon. Members have not been able to deploy their arguments as long as they would have wished. Any hon. Member who wishes to come separately to raise with me issues that they were not able to raise in the debate is welcome to do so.

The issues raised by the report of the Metropolitan Police Commissioner and the policing of London are broad. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said that he was worried about the ethnic attitudes of the police and ethnic requirement, and both those matters were picked up by other hon. Members. I say to those hon. Members who rightly raised these issues that the Metropolitan police are doing everything possible to increase the number of ethnic recruits without in any way reducing standards or trying to suggest that an ethnic recruit is somehow or other more special than any other recruit.

We are seeking to overcome the resistance of ethnic groups. No doubt that is based upon an unfortunate history, but we are trying to encourage them to join the police service. I beg hon. Members to recognise that they can help to try to improve the position. There are increasing signs that more people from the ethnic minorities are coming forward to try to join the Metropolitan police. Equally, there are many signs that they will not necessarily be able to stay, because pressures are sometimes placed upon them not to proceed. However, the commitment is there to do it.

The right hon. Gentleman made many references to Wapping and everything else that that entails. It is not possible to try to excise that problem from the rest of the duties of the Metropolitan police and to suggest that that is an excessive matter in the policing of London. The police must ensure that the streets of London are free for those who want to proceed upon their lawful way. There can be no question but that the incidents at Wapping, like incidents outside major football matches on Saturdays, must have Metropolitan police cover.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Shaw: I shall not give way, as time is short.

Although there is a major police commitment at Wapping, it was not of their choosing and the incidents there fully justify the police taking such precautions as they might. Moreover, the incidents have now spread well beyond Wapping. The News International warehouse in Deptford was destroyed by fire. On 19 June a TNT distribution depot in Kent was attacked by some 15 individuals. On 25 June another TNT depot in Luton was attacked and on 6 July a major attack was made on the TNT depot at Eastleigh in Hampshire involving about 300 individuals and damaging commercial and private vehicles, property and so on. That cannot but require the police to make substantial efforts to try to contain a massive incidence of criminal activity and public disorder.

Mr. Banks: Give Murdoch the bill.

Mr. Shaw: Happily, that was not the only event that hon. Members have sought to raise. I must commend the substantial progress made on crime prevention within the Metropolitan police district. There are significant limitations on what can be achieved and I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) that we cannot expect this to be a wand which will suddenly reduce crime figures. However, I trust that hon. Members will agree that it has a major effect upon anxieties about crime and a major direct contribution to make.

Let me deal now with consultative groups because that is where we must start to discuss accountability. Consultative groups were dealt with in section 106 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act and they have been a matter of great debate within London. There are still five boroughs within which no groups have been set up—Camden, Newham, Hackney, Southwark and a portion of the Welwyn and Hatfield borough for which the Metropolitan police district is responsible, but for which a consultative group is perhaps not appropriate.

Equally, there are boroughs where there is no council representation on the consultative group, such as Lambeth, Ealing, Brent and Haringey. The councils have decided not to participate. The answer to the question just posed by the hon. Member for Hammersmith is that, where statutory provision is made, and where there is a group which represents a much broader range of public opinion than the council can hope to do, it is essential that the council plays its full part in the consultative process. Not to do so is to undermine the purposes for which they were established.

I am glad to tell the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that at last there has been progress in Southwark. An agreement and a constitution have been arrived at. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the help that he gave and also to many others outside the House who have worked to achieve that. I understand that it is hoped that that group will be set up in September. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be delighted to know that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) talked about the problems of prostitution in Streatham. I recognise that in several places in London, including the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Westminister, North (Mr. Wheeler), there have been real problems in relation to that aspect of crime. It is difficult to contain, but I shall see that the matter is drawn to the attention of the officers concerned.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) asked about specials. Greater effort should be made in that regard, both within the police services outside the Metropolis, and, I hope, within. More police hours have been spent with specials in London than in the previous year — more than 419,500 man hours, compared to fewer than 300,000 man hours some five years ago. Here we have a big opportunity to involve people such as specials, and to recruit them. They may well come from the ethnic communites, and they could begin to assist in policing activities, such as the neighbourhood watch arrangements.

I turn to the points raised in connection with Tottenham and Haringey. I see that the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Atkinson) is in his place. I recognise that there have been tremendous problems, and reports have been deployed for public discussion. The report of Deputy Assistant Commissioner Richards was placed before the consultative committee in Haringey—be it noted—and was publicly discussed. The Commissioner's complete report on public disorders and Lord Gifford's report have also been published. So I say to the hon. Members for Tottenham and for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) that I understand that Lord Gifford's report raises several important issues. One of them involves Haringey council's participation in the consultative group. Lord Gifford agrees with the council's claim that at present the group is insufficiently representative but said that its boycott is misguided. However, I shall invite Lord Gifford to see me to discuss the report, as I recognise that there are issues that we should discuss.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) raised several constituency points. I was particularly interested in his comments on the Barnsbury estate. I also recognise that many valuable lessons can be learnt from the work done by the study group that was set up in Islington. That work demonstrates a theme that ran through the speeches of several hon. Members which is that what people perceive to be the case about their communities should be important in discussing how they wish to be policed. I fully accept that. It was just that sort of contribution that worked so effectively in the Lambeth consultative group, and which enabled the return to normality following the riots in Brixton. There was a massive improvement in the relations between the police and the community, although Lambeth council seeks to undermine it at every opportunity. I accept that there are important lessons to be learnt from that.

When travelling up and down the country I often found that the problems on estates lessened as proper residents' or community associations set about reducing graffiti and vandalism, and increased the pride felt by those living there. On that basis, crime prevention techniques can surely work and improve the community.

In talking about crime prevention, we do not seek purely to provide adequate safeguards against the continued growth in burglary, vandalism and graffiti. We are trying to make the environment safer and to reduce the anxieties of local people. I think that all Members want that.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Shaw: I am sorry, but I do not have time to give way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) spoke strongly in support of the recent announcement by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on the right of peremptory challenge, which will no doubt have a contribution to make in relation to the operation of our courts.

The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) made a thoughtful speech and stressed the problems caused by hostility and distrust. He also mentioned that speed of recovery from a situation is probably directly related to improved liaison between the police and the community. I think that he cited the case of Brixton in that regard. I also welcomed his comments about the professional handling of those who are brought into police stations for questioning. I believe that that will be accepted as the right way of going about such issues, although I recognise that the police service in turn has a major commitment in trying to achieve that in the relatively short time since the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 has been in force.

[Mr. Shaw]

The debate has ranged widely, because the problems of policing in London are also wide-ranging. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has said, we have a large police district and by far the largest police force in the United Kingdom. Most criminal activity is centred on our capital city, especially in relation, for example, to heroin and security issues. London is unique in that regard.

The House must recognise the strains and stresses of operating in the Metropolitan police service. Examples have been quoted of inadequate policing, insensitive policing or policing which does not accord with the views of some hon. Members. Conditions cannot be improved, however, without a proper and logical basis on which dialogue with the police can take place.

It is absurd to believe——

Mr. Corbyn rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put but MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER withheld his assent and declined then to put that Question.

Mr. Shaw: —that by making councils responsible for policing activity——

It being half past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Mr. Tony Banks: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Cohen: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Question proposed,

That Standing Order No. 6 (Arrangement of public business) shall have effect for this Session with the following modifications, namely, in paragraph (2)(b) the words 'not more than two' shall be substituted for the word 'one' in line 20 and the word 'four' shall be substituted for the word 'two' in line 22.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Tony Banks: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The debate on policing in the Metropolis is supposed to be the annual event when Members can express their feelings and, through the Home Secretary, hold the Metropolitan police to account. It is a special occasion for London Members.

I am a Back-Bench Member trying to represent the constituency of Newham, North-West, and through pressure of time I was effectively prevented from representing my constituents in the debate. I know that there are devices open to me as a Member to raise matters of concern within my constituency, but I wanted to raise them within the debate on policing in the Metropolis. We are constantly told that the debate is the one occasion when we can exercise some form of accountability over the Metropolitan police. I think that that is a constitutional nonsense, but that is what we are told.

At 11.30 am we spent 35 or 40 minutes on an important statement, and that time was taken from the debate on policing in the Metropolis. I submit that when that happens, 35 or 40 minutes, or however long is spent on the statement, should be added on to our proceedings. I give notice in raising this point of order that I shall raise this issue with the Procedure Committee. I hope that I shall be supported by my Back-Bench colleagues, many of whom were limited by the pressure on time. Some of them could not participate at all, which is even worse.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I understand these frustrations and I recognise that the hon. Member for Newham North-West (Mr. Banks) has had a frustrating day. He has addressed himself to the right procedures. The issue he has raised is one for the House to decide through the Procedure Committee and is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Cohen: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. One of the key aspects of the debate on policing in the Metropolis is that the Commissioner's report, which has been agreed by Home Office Ministers, states that there will be additional militarisation for the Metropolitan police. It is being authorised to buy military-type weapons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot raise matters of policy on points of order.

Mr. Cohen: I am not, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am saying ——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must inform me what his point of order is.

Mr. Cohen: My point of order is that at 29 minutes past two o'clock my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) attempted to obtain a vote by a procedural means that you ruled out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is vital in the interests of Londoners that there should be a vote on whether the increased militarisation of the police goes ahead. It is a disgrace to democracy and so-called accountability that such a decision should be made. The Guardian has stated that it will involve more accidental death and alienation, and will arouse precisely the patterns that Scarman urged the police to cool. It is a disgrace that this should go ahead without us having an opportunity to vote upon the issue. I ask for your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on how we can secure such a vote.

Mr. Corbyn: Further to the earlier point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you understand the frustrations of London Members on such matters. Can you advise the House by what means we can obtain a vote on an important statement made by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis through the Home Secretary? [Interruption.] The hon. Member who seeks to interrupt is outside the Chamber. Therefore, he has no right to interrupt. Can you advise us, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by what means we can ensure that, before the House rises for the summer recess, there can be a debate and a vote on the question of the Commissioner's report to the House of Commons so that hon. Members who wish to do so may express their dissatisfaction with the method and policy of policing in London?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are ways and means of putting down appropriate motions on which a vote can be taken. That is not a matter for me.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Question proposed,

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 16th July, the Motion in the name of Mr. John Biffen relating to Office, Secretarial and Research Allowance may be proceeded with, though opposed, until half-past Eleven o'clock or for one and a half hours after it has been entered upon, whichever is the later, and if proceedings thereon have not been disposed of by that hour Mr. Speaker shall put the Question on any Amendment which may have been moved, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any other Amendments selected by him which may then be moved, and on the Main Question or the Main Question, as amended.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Hon. Members: Object.

Premature Babies

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

2.36 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I wanted the House to debate the subject of experimentation on premature babies because of my profound respect for life and my conviction that Parliament is failing miserably to protect it. In the remarks I shall make, it is not my intention to undermine the confidence or support that the general public has in and for the medical profession. However, I regret that among some quarters, especially those in support of experimentation, there is an arrogance, almost amounting to insolence, that the medical profession knows best and that Joe Public does not know what he is talking about and has no right to an opinion. Such a view is unacceptable. The mood of the British people is changing. We have a right to know the truth. That is what we expect; nothing less.

Most people accept that life begins at conception. I am not aware of any opponent of that view having been able to disprove it. With that in mind, the House will not be surprised at how concerned I and many other people were when the findings of a report published by the Institute of Medical Ethics was released. People were appalled to learn that about 2,000 sick or premature babies are used in medical experiments each year without parental consent. The Sunday Express published a leader headlined "A Sick Society" which stated:

> "We have allowed abortion to grow into a major industry which kills the unborn as a matter of routine. We permit medical science to conduct experiments on the human foetus. It is commonplace now for scientists to argue that embryos should be produced solely for the benefit of research. Will it really be any surprise if future generations look back on the evils we permit and conclude that our society was rotten beyond redemption?"

I am pleased to see that my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves) is in his place in the Chamber. He will recall a conversation that we had some weeks ago with an eminent doctor who had just returned from visiting an abortion clinic in London. That clinic specialised in late abortions that were given primarily to people from overseas. So late were those abortions that a mincing machine had to be used to destroy the limbs. Only a few weeks ago we read of an abortion where the child was still alive. If ever those words of the leader in the Sunday Express were true, they are true now.

The medical experiments to which I shall refer involve invasive procedures, some of which could prove harmful to the babies, whilst others could benefit them. Some might be quite simple techniques, such as taking blood samples. Others could be far more harmful. We do not know. Nor do we know how many of those experiments would be in connection with developing new forms of treatment. I am told that a number would be in connection with learning more about the basic physiology of premature babies and, in some cases, improving the care of those infants, perhaps by the use of drugs or other means.

As for parental consent, if research involving invasive techniques was carried out on a child for whom no direct benefit was intended and that research might damage that child, I regard it as irrelevant to be told that the parents gave permission. Surely in this country giving my permission would not make lawful any kind of assault on my children, no matter how beneficial the result may be in helping other children. That was the view of the DHSS and the Medical Research Council only six years ago when, in 1980, a report from the Social Services Committee on perinatal and neonatal mortality was published and highly publicised as the Short report. In that report, parliamentarians were told that the MRC said:

"in the strict view of the law, parents and guardians of minors cannot give consent on their behalf to any procedures which are of no particular benefit to them and which may carry such risk of harm".

The DHSS said:

"the position in law is that no parent or guardian of tender years is entitled to give consent to any procedure which is not for the benefit of the child."

Of course, there was something of an outcry at the time about the suggestion that newborn handicapped babies might be used for experimental purposes.

As the Short report claimed that there was no on which to base the DHSS and MRC advice, counsel's opinion was sought by the pro-life lobby. In this, counsel quotes the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 as amended by the Children and Young Persons Act 1963 and the Children Act 1975 and says:

"statute law or case law"

"If any person who has attained the age of 16 years and has the custody, charge or care of any child or young person under that age wilfully assaults, illtreats, neglects, abandons or exposes him or causes or procures him to be assaulted, illtreated, neglected, abandoned or exposed in a manner likely to cause him unnecessary suffering of injury to health, that person shall be guilty of an offence."

The view of counsel was that this covered any invasive procedures on a child that could do it harm, were not for the direct benefit of the child concerned and that were prohibited by that legislation as well as by trite law.

During the study by the Society for the Study of Medical Ethics, many reports of research on children undertaken in the United Kingdom and published in British journals were examined. Few described a project that might have been unethical, although some projects could be described as being unkind. However, some research projects carried out overseas would have been most unlikely to receive ethical approval from any British research ethics committee. A French researcher performed four lumbar punctures each on 57 newborn babies in the first two weeks of their life, in an unsuccessful attempt to find biochemical support for a rather unlikely scientific theory about brain damage in infants. An Indian team performed liver biopsies on 29 children with biochemically normal liver functions, because the children had sibling with Indian childhood cirrhosis and the researchers were looking—unsuccessfully I might add—for evidence to support the idea that that disease had a genetic origin.

I understand that, at the Cambridge neonatal intensive care unit, it is not the practice to get consent from parents for all experiments. The Institute of Medical Ethics bulletin includes a report from a meeting at which a Cambridge consultant actually said that it was unethical to obtain permission from parents and that they should be told as soon as possible afterwards. The same unit has been examining the respiratory distress syndrome and has been trying to find a way of getting the missing chemical back into the lungs of premature babies. Having met with no success, is it worth while continuing and is such research of benefit?

I have to tell the House that I, along with many other people, am not satisfied with controls on experimentation on life. The DHSS, following a recommendation, put out a circular in 1975 calling for research ethics committees to be established as an obvious safeguard and form of control. As far as I am aware, absolutely nothing has happened since that recommendation. I would be interested to know what safeguards the Department requires on experimentation. What procedures have to be adhered to? What checks are carried out, and how?

I fully recognise the marvellous advances that medical science has made in so many areas of health care. However, in certain quarters there is an arrogance that amounts to a view that research is all-important regardless of the lives being used or destroyed to that end.

Only this week, the largest lobby of this Session—well over 10,000 women, men and children—took place in support of the Bill which my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn sought to introduce. I say to my right hon. Friend the Minister and to my party, if we are looking for popular legislation to introduce, that which would outlaw experimentation and give protection to the unborn child is what the whole nation cries out for. If we fail to act on these matters, we shall rightly be regarded with contempt. If we grasp the nettle, future generations will salute this Parliament as a Parliament of Kings.

Mr. Ken Hargreaves (Hyndburn): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) for allowing me to speak in his Adjournment debate. Like him, I was concerned to read the report produced by the Institute of Medical Ethics, and, like him, I was delighted that the Sunday Express published an important leader on the subject—a leader which I feel put forward the views of the overwhelming majority in this country.

It was a brave gesture on the part of the Sunday Express when one considers that the largest rally I have seen this Parliament—some 10,000 people lobbying Members of Parliament against research on human embryos on Wednesday—was totally ignored by the national press and television, with the exception of a few lines in The Guardian My appearance on Central television was cancelled because the viewers were likely to be upset by the subject.

The pro-life issue is not a popular one with the media, or the Government who seem to accept abortion on demand and apparently condone experiments on embryos. Having set up the Warnock committee because they recognised the danger of developments in embryology, they have done nothing about it.

If we have no respect for human life at its earliest and most vulnerable stage, should we be surprised that at a later stage, muggings, rape and murder increase? Do they not stem from the same lack of respect we show if we support abortion on demand and experiments on embryos and premature babies?

In 1980 a highly regarded parliamentary Select Committee concluded that the law prevented any invasive procedures on a child which could do it harm and which were not for the direct benefit of the child involved. That view of the law was confirmed by the DHSS and the Medical Research Council. Indeed, the Select Committee recommended that the DHSS should arrange for further medico-legal discussions, with a view to amending the law as it relates to research on newborn infants. No such discussions have taken place and certainly no Bills of such a nature have been put before the House. Yet within six years we learn that the medical establishment—playing God — has started undertaking these practices in hundreds, possibly thousands, of cases.

The latest report contradicts the Short report and tells us that these procedures are allowable. However, it says that efforts should be made to develop scales quantifying risk and benefit—to others, not to the child concerned —so as to reduce reliance on the qualitative description of risk in use at present.

The report is a chilling insight into the activities of some doctors. It is very worrying for parents and patients, and makes all patients wonder whether they are being used as human guinea pigs. The way ahead for research is through mutual trust and not hoodwinking trusting, unsuspecting people, be they patient or parent.

2.50 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) on choosing the subject of experiments on premature babies for his Adjournment debate. He gave time to our hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves), but I must reject the latter's assertions about the Government's attitude to abortion and research on human embryos that he included in his short intervention.

I am very glad to have the opportunity to reply to this debate on the important topic of research on premature babies. The vulnerability of children and of young babies makes particularly repugnant any suggestion that research is being carried out on them which is either harmful or unethical. I share the concern, so eloquently and properly expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon, arising from the recent report from the working group of the Institute of Medical Ethics on medical research with children, which suggests that breaches of existing codes of practice in that area may be taking place. While my officials are not aware of any direct evidence to that effect, I can assure my hon. Friend that I shall look carefully at what he has said today and make urgent inquiries about the matters that he has raised or that others raise with me as a result of the debate, because I fully accept the great importance of the subject.

The conduct of clinical research in this country is governed by the provisions of the general law and by the ethics of the medical profession. It is, I understand, widely accepted that research investigations on human beings should be governed by codes of practice such as those of the World Medical Association and of the Medical Research Council. Those are general statements of principle. More detailed guidance on the application of those principles has also been issued in this country by the Royal College of Physicians, in 1967, 1973 and most recently in 1984 and, specifically on research on children, by the British Paediatric Association in 1980.

In 1962, the Medical Research Council issued a statement on responsibility in investigations on human research because rapid advances in medical knowledge over the preceding 50 years were posing increasing legal and ethical problems for both investigators and their subjects. In 1967 the Royal College of Physicians recommended that clinical research investigations should be subject to ethical review. In 1973 the college made detailed recommendations on the composition and scope of the ethical committees which conduct that review.

In 1984 the college published further guidelines on the practice of ethics committees in medical research, which summarised aspects of the practice of ethics committees and the problems that they face. That guidance again stresses the importance of all research projects affecting human subjects going before an ethics committee for consideration of both the ethical aspects and quality of the proposal, makes recommendations for the membership and mode of working of ethics committees and gives guidance on some of the particular issues that the committees need to consider in relation to each project that comes before them. They would, for example, include the way in which consent is to be obtained, the involvement of vulnerable groups in research and so on. Those guidelines are relevant to the conduct of all research, including trials, and the particular dilemmas of conducting research on children are clearly acknowledged.

The ethics of health research in this country has traditionally and generally been for self-regulation by the health professions. However, in 1975, as my hon. Friend said, the Department of Health and Social Security gave advice to health authorities based on the Royal College of Physicians' deliberations. The then Secretary of State accepted the college's recommendations on the composition of ethical committees and asked health authorities to put those recommendations into effect. Two matters of particular importance were drawn to health authorities' attention. First, health authorities were asked to note the Royal College of Physicians' report recommendation that all proposed clinical research investigations should be referred to an ethical committee. The second concerned clinical research investigations of children or mentally handicapped adults. The DHSS guidance drew attention to the uncertainties of the law of consent in that respect. I shall return to that in more detail in a moment.

This departmental guidance was issued more than a decade ago and I am glad to confirm to my hon. Friend that consideration is being given as to whether new guidance from the Department is now required. While I cannot yet say what such new guidance might cover, subjects for inclusion could well be the composition, status and functioning of ethical committees and the need for all clinical research investigations in NHS institutions to be referred to them. In the light of the recent report on research on children, the need to include up-to-date advice on the position of minors in research trials is also very much in my mind.

As things stand, all the available guidelines recognise the problems involved in considering research on children. However, there is a wide range of views about the type of research of which children might ethically be the subject and on questions about who can consent to a child's involvement in a research project. The Medical Research Council's advice issued in 1962 said:

"The situation in respect of minors (and mentally subnormal or mentally disordered persons) is of particular difficulty. In the strict view of the law parents and guardians of minors cannot give consent on their behalf to any procedures which are of no particular benefit to them and which may carry some risk of harm. Whilst English law does not fix any arbitrary age in this context, it may safely be assumed that the Courts will not regard a child of 12 years or under (or 14 years or under for boys in Scotland) as having the capacity to consent to any procedure which may involve him in an injury. Above this age the reality of any purported consent which may have been obtained is a question of fact as with an adult the evidence would, if necessary, have to show that irrespective of age the person concerned fully understood the implications to himself of the procedures to which he was consenting.

Even when true consent has been given by a minor (or a mentally subnormal or mentally disordered person) consideration of ethics and prudence still require that, if possible, the assent of parents or guardians or relatives, as the case may be, should be obtained.

Investigations that are of no direct benefit to the individual require, therefore, that his true consent to them shall be explicitly obtained. After adequate explanation, the consent of an adult of sound mind and understanding can be relied upon to be true consent. In the case of children and young persons the question of whether purported consent as true consent would in each case depend upon facts such as the age, intelligence, situation and character of the subject and nature of the investigations".

That was the MRC's statement of the position in 1962. But legal advice coming to me now talks in terms of the maturity and degree of understanding that the young person demonstrates — a somewhat different concept. The implications of the House of Lords' judgment in the Gillick case will have some relevance in relation to consent for research, but clearly not in the context of premature babies. As a non-lawyer, I am straying on to dangerous ground and I shall return to the broader approach.

The World Health Organisation has accepted that the participation of children in research is indispensible for research on diseases of childhood and conditions to which children are particularly susceptible. It suggests that it is acceptable to allow children to participate in projects aimed at gaining knowledge on physiological or pathological conditions peculiar to infancy and childhood. The British Paediatric Association guidelines issued in 1980 assume that research which involves a child but is of no benefit to that child is not necessarily either unethical or illegal.

The Institute of Medical Ethics report suggests that the position should now be that the parent may consent to a research procedure if, when judged objectively, any risk involved in the research procedure is so small that it would not be against the child's interest to be exposed to that risk. It recommends that further efforts should be made to develop scales quantifying risk and benefit, as my hon. Friend said.

In an area which is governed by common law, and in the absence of any decided cases on the subject, it is not possible to be certain about how the courts would currently respond to this question. However, in view of the evident confusion that exists, I am sure that this must be carefully considered and these matters are included in the review of existing guidance I referred to a moment or two ago.

However, I receive very clear legal advice that, except in an emergency, a doctor may not lawfully give treatment which involves touching a person without that person's consent. And consent is valid only if it is given voluntarily by the person who has the capacity to consent and after appropriate information has been given to enable the decision of consent to be made. If a doctor fails to obtain a valid consent he will commit the tort and crime of battery and may also incur liability in negligence. It would also lay the doctor open to disciplinary action by the General Medical Council.

Early-day motion 916 of which my hon. Friends are co-sponsors also refers to the subject of this debate. It suggests that the existing law is inadequate in this respect. However, I hope that what I have just said makes it clear that the law as it currently stands would not sanction experiments on young babies without their parents' knowledge or consent.

Let me make it quite clear that research on young children should take place only in well understood and properly authorised circumstances. The Institute of Medical Ethics working party was not, I understand, set up because the institute had any specific reason to believe that breaches of existing guidelines or ethical standards were taking place. It has helped to identify the very real ethical difficulties which can confront researchers in undertaking research on children and in obtaining parental consent to research on young babies.

Let there be no doubt about the widespread public concern that would be aroused if investigators were to develop an inflated sense of the importance of research and place this above the rights of children and their parents. Let me quote again from the 1962 report of the Medical Research Council:

"It should be clearly understood that the possibility or probability that a particular investigation will be of benefit to humanity or to posterity would afford no defence in the event of legal proceedings. The individual has rights that the law protects and nobody can infringe those rights for the public good. In investigations of this type it is, therefore, always necessary to ensure that the true consent of the subject is explicitly obtained."

I hope that this short debate will have helped to clarify some of the confusion that undoubtedly exists. I also hope that the consideration that I have said is being carried out will help to put these matters on to a better and proper footing.

Reference was made to legislation dealing with the Warnock report and to experiments on the human embryo. It is appropriate for me to say again that on the crucial issue of experiments on human embryos the Government's position, as has been stated very many times, is one of neutrality and that legislation on these matters will be introduced by the Government as soon as practicable.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Drink-Driving

1. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any further proposals to reduce the number of drink-driving offences; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): This year we have had the first-ever summer publicity focus. I am considering how to maintain the vital campaign against drunk driving. A quarter of all road deaths are drink related. About 5,200 people died on our roads last year.

Mr. Dormand: Does the Minister agree that drink-driving offences are a scourge of modern society, as is demonstrated by that horrible figure that he has just given? Reports show that the estimate that one quarter of road deaths are drink-related is a conservative one.

Mr. Peter Bottomley indicated assent.

Mr. Dormand: I see that the Minister agrees with me. Does he also agree that there is no excuse for drunken driving and that a conviction ought to result in a gaol sentence? What is he considering doing about that?

Mr. Bottomley: I do not want to take up the hon. Gentleman's point about an automatic gaol sentence, because that is not in my hands today. What is in my hands is a booklet called "The Facts About Drinking And Driving", which is available to anyone who rings 0200 234888. Anyone who reads the information in that booklet will suddenly realise that he has no need to join the 100,000 people who are convicted each year and that he should not be one of the larger number who put themselves and others at risk.

We must change attitudes. There is some wholly irresponsible public behaviour, and the interest that hon. Members in all parts of the House are showing may lead to the sort of action that the hon. Gentleman is seeking, but I can give no commitment on that.

Mr. Sackville: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a growing problem of accidents involving not only drunk drivers but those who are either unqualified to drive or uninsured? Does he agree that people indulging in such criminally irresponsible behaviour should be more harshly dealt with, and that there should be a better system of compensation for their victims?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We should stick to the original question, which was about drunk driving.

Mr. Bottomley: Perhaps I may answer my hon. Friend briefly. Public reaction and involvement will make the greatest difference. Various things that we do on our roads are wholly unacceptable, including driving while unqualified, disqualified or drunk.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Transport Act 1981 does not specifically allow for drunk-driving convictions to be based on retrospective evidence and that the medical profession criticises such tests as unreliable? Will the hon. Gentleman amend the Act to prevent abuse and to confine such cases, if we must have them, to special circumstances?

Mr. Bottomley: Given the recent case, I had better not comment directly on that part of the hon. Gentleman's question. The point to remember is that people like us occasionally appear in court with the excuse that they went out for a social drink, even though they are convicted for having twice the legal limit of alcohol in their blood, which means that they have done a great deal of drinking. We must try to get away from our personal excuses for breaking the law and putting people at risk.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his excellent campaign and I recognise that drunk-driving kills, but could my hon. Friend suggest ways of bringing in the breathalyser and random breath tests throughout the year? More than 1,600 people a year lose their lives in drink-related accidents, and something needs to be done. I know that the Government are committed to doing something.

Mr. Bottomley: Certainly something is being done, and it is worth remembering the summer publicity focus. Our campaign towards the end of the year appeared to be working, as the Home Office statistical bulletin showed. Police can administer breath tests when there has been a moving traffic offence, after an accident or when they suspect that a driver has been drinking. We cover all categories.

Mr. Stott: The hon. Gentleman may not be aware of the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and I moved an amendment when the Transport Act 1981 was going through the House to apply what were termed the Blennerhassett provisions to give the police much more scope in evidential breath testing. Unfortunately, the amendment was not accepted by the Standing Committee, so we have the present system in operation.

The Minister and I are both concerned about road safety and about drinking and driving, but is he aware that his remarks about a recent case were a little precipitant? In view of what happened and what the hon. Gentleman said, it might be worth the House looking at the question again in a different light.

Mr. Bottomley: That may be so, but if the hon. Gentleman reads my remarks he will see that I avoided mentioning a particular case — [Interruption.] Despite laughter from the Opposition, I regard it as my job to bring down the number of casualties. The rate has dropped in the past 30 years, but the biggest remaining killer is drunk driving. I speak for the civil liberties of those at risk.

Drivers' Hours

2. Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received concerning commercial vehicle drivers' hours.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. John Moore): The road transport unions have made representations to me, both directly and through right hon. and hon. Members, and I met union representatives, together with the hon. Members for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) and for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) on 3 July.

Mr. Bidwell: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in a recent reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry), the Minister responsible for road safety, the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) said:

"There is no clearly established connection between driving hours and fatigue."

Did he mean that? Is the Secretary of State aware of the widespread concern that the new EEC regulations will lead exactly to that? We shall find out tomorrow.

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman was involved in a delegation that he brought to me the other day. I listened carefully to what he said, but I do not accept his contention. The House will have the opportunity to debate the matter late tomorrow night when we discuss drivers' hours.

Mr. Gregory: Attention has rightly been drawn to drivers' hours. When a driver is not driving, is he not meant to be resting? Will my right hon. Friend consider introducing a personal log book such as that used by pilots so that a driver cannot continue driving for gain or profit? If we introduce such a system not the number of accidents be greatly reduced?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend will the opportunity to make that point in greater detail tomorrow night, but I shall certainly consider what he has said. We are introducing the new regulations to give greater flexibility, including less driving per fortnight, and more weekly rest, which is a critical factor.

Mr. Foot: Will the Secretary of State undertake to hold up the provisions that he plans to put before us tomorrow night until we have had longer to examine them? Has he met the drivers on the job? If he has, what did they say to him, and what did he say in reply? Will he exercise some authority and give the House of Commons a full chance of discussing this important matter—not late at night—because of the widespread concern about it?

Mr. Moore: I always listen with care to the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), but the Minister responsible for roads, my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), has had extensive consultation on the issue and it has been under discussion for a considerable time. I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman the undertaking which he seeks. So far my Department has received 130 letters from the public, compared with 45 letters from hon. Members. There will be an opportunity to discuss the matter again tomorrow.

Mr. Stott: Is the Minister aware of the written answer by his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) alluded? He said:

"There is no clearly established connection between driving hours and fatigue." — [Official Report, 25 June 1986; Vol. 100, c. 242.]

Is the Secretary of State aware that the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety — an all-party group in the House and outside—estimates that 11 per cent. of PSV and HGV accidents involve driver fatigue? Will the Secretary of State ensure that his hon. Friend is further briefed before he comes to the House for the debate tomorrow night?

Mr. Moore: There is no difficulty in asking my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, who is responsible for roads, to read briefs, because he reads them extensively already. We are proposing a new pattern of regulations which will provide for less driving and more weekly rest. It is the end product of a long period of consultation. I am sure that the House will find the regulations acceptable tomorrow night.

Driving Test Centres

3. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria are used to determine whether driving conditions are sufficiently difficult to justify the establishment of a driving test centre in a particular locality; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We need routes with the greatest variety of traffic conditions and hazards within the area.

Mr. Amess: I listened carefully to my hon. Friend, but does he agree that my constituency more than meets the criteria for a test centre? We have the greatest number of applicants for tests in Essex, we have to travel long distances to Brentwood and Grays, and our shopping centre is so successful that our driving conditions are more than testing.

Mr. Bottomley: The problem is not just the number of people who want to take the test. The problem lies in the Basildon one-way system, its wide and open junctions and well planned roundabouts. It has few traffic lights, and I understand that the town centre is a pedestrian precinct. I would have thought that the four test centres within 13 miles of Basildon, at Brentwood, Grays, Southend and Chelmsford, would allow someone who is about to be tested to relax as he drives there, and perhaps be more successful in his test.

Mr. Hardy: I am in no way suggesting that people drive tractors around Basildon, but I have a constituent who is seeking to get a driving licence to drive a tractor in the Rotherham area. He has been told that he must wait until there are several other applicants for tractor driving tests, and the delay is threatening his employment. Will the Minister look with a great deal of urgency at the letter I sent to him?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes, Sir. We are conscious that where employment is tied to passing a test it is up to us to ensure that people can take their test as soon as possible. We are also trying to reduce the general waiting list for tests.

Bath

4. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to remove trunk road through traffic from Bath.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Trunk road traffic travelling in an east-west direction was removed from Bath when the M4 motorway was opened. We propose to provide a north-south bypass of Bath, linking the A46 and A36 trunk roads, in conjunction with the Batheaston bypass to the east of the city.

Mr. Chapman: Will my hon. Friend confirm that a north-south bypass for this historic city must remain a top and urgent priority? Will he confirm that it is also the Government's priority to see that bypasses are constructed around other historic cities and villages and that the additional cost of doing that is on top of, and not at the expense of, other parts of the Government's road building programme?

Mr. Bottomley: I accept both parts of my hon. Friend's supplementary question. Obviously, greater relief for Bath is important. We have added to the programme 81 bypasses and relief roads for historic towns and villages since 1979 and will continue to give high priority to the Government's bypass programme. The achievement of our plans will be greatly assisted by the increase in funds available for trunk road construction. The only difficulty would come, perhaps in Bath and certainly other places, if the national roads programme were dramatically reduced to what it was between 1974 and 1979.

Cyclists (Highway Code)

5. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what factors led him to bring forward amendments to the "Highway Code" relating to the safety of cyclists.

Mr. Moore: Both cyclists and other road users should be more aware of the vulnerability of cyclists in accidents. That is why we are proposing amendments to the "Highway Code".

Mrs. Bottomley: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply and for the efforts that he and his Department have made to recognise more the needs of cyclists as fellow road users. May I remind him that cyclists still face around 300 deaths a year and 6,000 serious accidents or injuries? Will he look again at the investigations by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory and, perhaps more important, at the request by the Cyclists' Touring Club, which has its headquarters in my constituency, that greater diagrammatic emphasis should be given in the new Highway Code to the needs of cyclists, as all too many people learn through visual images rather than the written word?

Mr. Moore: I am conscious of the fact that my hon. Friend raised this important issue for her constituency and for the general public in an Adjournment debate on 16 May before my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker). I am conscious of the important points that she has made. I shall certainly look at the points that she has made about graphical material, because that is a perfectly legitimate point to examine.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Will my right hon. Friend look at the growing numbers of cyclists who are deliberately disregarding traffic lights, driving through them, driving without lights at night and contributing to the large numbers of deaths and accidents which my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) has just mentioned? Will he ask the police to pay particular attention to that as it is putting other road users at great risk?

Mr. Moore: If my hon. Friend is factually correct, he is right in saying that those who injure and create injuries must obey the "Highway Code." Clearly one of the changes to the "Highway Code" proposed by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary is to include, for the first time, references with relevance to cyclists. Obviously that is an important change.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Secretary of State aware that since the abolition of the GLC's cycling project team there is no co-ordination and development of cycle lanes around London? How many miles of cycle lanes would the right hon. Gentleman make his objective? What is his objective? The GLC set a target of 1,000 miles.

Mr. Moore: The GLC set many targets and did many other things that I would not wish to go into now. There is no need for us to do other than delight at the demise of that erstwhile irrelevant organisation. Having said that, I am interested in cycle lanes and will consider the particular point that the hon. Gentleman has raised. I shall do so in the hope of coming up with a serious comment unlike the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question.

Mr. Couchman: In considering the dangers in which cyclists find themselves, is my right hon. Friend aware of the jeopardy in which they are placed by drivers who use hand-held radio telephones while driving? Will he take urgent steps to dissuade drivers from this extremely dangerous practice?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is making a legitimate point. There are references to the problem of hand-held radio telephones in the new "Highway Code", and we must concern ourselves with the obvious vulnerability of cyclists. As my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) said, over 300 cyclists—345, in fact — were killed in 1984. The figure was slightly reduced in 1985, when 295 were killed, but it is still unacceptable.

Mr. Dormand: The Secretary of State knows full well that the main reason why he introduced these amendments to the "Highway Code" is that I persuaded him recently to join the all-party friends of cycling group. I am now awaiting the receipt of his £1. Will the right hon. Gentleman draw the attention of the Lord Chancellor to a deplorable accident that happened recently in which a cyclist was killed by a lorry, when the coroner said that cyclists should not be permitted on the road on which the accident took place? Cyclists have as much right to be on any road as any other road user. Will the right hon. Gentleman do something about that?

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman will recall that cyclists must not use motorways. I have seen the hon. Gentleman pedalling around Parliament Square and I am conscious of his serious interest in the subject. I shall seek to draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor to the point that he made.

Channel Tunnel

6. Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will make available the report on the impact of the proposed Channel tunnel on Kent.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): The preliminary assessment report was published on 11 July, and copies have been placed in the Library. The second stage of the study will build on this initial report.

Mr. Hunt: As one who supports and applauds the decision on the Channel tunnel, may I ask my hon. Friend, in the context of the report, whether he has yet made any assessment of the likely effect of the construction of the cross-Channel link upon employment opportunities in Kent in the years immediately ahead?

Mr. Mitchell: During construction we expect an average of about 3,000 people to be employed on the project. About half of them will be recruited locally. In addition, there will be a substantial number of jobs north of Watford as a result of the purchasing of about £900 million worth of goods, many of them from the engineering sector.

Mr. Aitken: Now that the Japanese banks and the French investors have rather sensibly welshed on their commitment to produce even the first £200 million of equity for this $6 billion project, surely it is time to consider whether it is right for the taxpayer to continue to pay the bills for such expensive reports as the "Kent Impact Study", important though that is. Has not the time come to say that no more parliamentary time or public money should be spent on the project until the business men behind Eurotunnel have re-established their lost financial credibility?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend has somewhat exaggerated the position, and not for the first time. The timing of the decision when to go to the market for further equity is entirely a matter for the commercial judgment of the promoters and their professional advisers. They have decided that it will be best for them to do that after the holiday season, and that seems to make a lot of sense.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: Will the Minister start to understand that this monstrous scheme will have a severe impact on areas other than Kent? When will he decide to take the advice of his hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) and scrap the whole damned nonsense?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is misled to the extent that his fellow right hon. and hon. Members took a judgment on the matter by a vote of 309 to 44. I do not think that he should cast these aspersions on his colleagues and let them go unanswered.

STOLport (Sheffield)

7. Sir John Osborn asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will consider the feasibility of establishing a STOLport at Sheffield.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): It is for potential developers to undertake feasibility studies for the establishment of new airports such as a STOLport at Sheffield.

Mr. Osborn: Is my hon. Friend aware that south Yorkshire and Sheffield is the biggest industrial area with the densest population in Europe without airport facilities? In the past the Government have worked with local authorities to provide the climate to develop airports. As Brymon and British Caledonian would like to go ahead, will he act as a catalyst with the Secretary of State for the Environment so that European funds can be made available to put Sheffield and south Yorkshire on the air map?

Mr. Spicer: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his persistance with this idea. As he may know, there are four airports within 40 miles of Sheffield-Manchester, Leeds-Bradford, East Midlands and Humberside. If a local authority asked us to agree to the necessary capital allocation for a STOLport at Sheffield, we would need to be sure that the investment met our normal criterion of a financial return of 7 per cent. If an application were made for European funds, that would be considered on its merits.

Severn Crossing

8. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now make a statement on the completion of the feasibility study into the proposed construction of a second Severn crossing.

Mr. Moore: The consultants are completing their study on time and their final report is expected any day now. It will be published and I shall be making an announcement shortly on its conclusions in consultation with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Secretary of State appreciate that the Welsh economy is in a parlous condition, with heavy unemployment? Is he further aware that he could ease the position with an early announcement authorising the building of a second crossing of the River Severn and by accepting the recommendation of the Select Committee on Transport calling for the abolition of tolls on estuarial crossings? A favourable announcement on both matters would be well received throughout Wales and in many other hard-pressed areas.

Mr. Moore: I cannot comment on the Government's position in advance of our response to the Select Committee about estuarial tolls. I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has made it clear that, above all else, he is aware of the critical nature for the Welsh economy of an additional link to south Wales.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the Secretary of State give a guarantee that as it is three or four months since the Transport Select Committee reported on tolls, he will give an answer while the House is sitting so that he may be questioned on it?

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman is referring to the Government's response to the Select Committee report. I cannot give a guarantee at this stage, but I recognise the hon. Gentleman's point and I shall do everything in my power to ensure that the answer reaches the House while it is still sitting.

Motorway Repairs

9. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with the speed with which motorway repairs are undertaken.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No, Sir. The increased use of lane rental contracts, which give the contractor an incentive to complete early, is enabling us to speed up major renewal schemes, achieving in some cases time savings of about 25 per cent.

Mr. Knox: Will my hon. Friend explain why it appears to take so long to effect repairs to motorways? Will he also explain why so much of the motorway network appears to be under repair?

Mr. Bottomley: Part of the reason is that people forgot that motorways eventually need replacing and that we are trying to deal with the legacy from before 1979. Cones are needed for various reasons which are not always obvious: to protect the concrete which is still curing; to protect excavated areas or damaged safety fences; to provide a safety zone for workmen; and to provide access for contractors or emergency vehicles.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Is the Minister aware of the hardship experienced by my constituents because of repairs to the Barton high-level bridge on the M62, which are likely to take three years? This is causing unnecessary hardship to people living in Eccles, Swinton, Pendlebury and Worsley. What will he do about that?

Mr. Bottomley: I am aware of the strong representations that the hon. Gentleman has been making on behalf of his constituents and others who have been held up by the necessary widening of the bridge. I have also been receiving representations from my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), whose constituency is nearby. I shall consider whether we can rearrange the work in any way, to allow all the work to be completed substantially faster. If I can, I shall make a public announcement and, I hope, send copies to the hon. Members concerned.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Is my hon. Friend aware that there seem to be so many cones down our main roads nowadays that one wonders whether the Common Market is giving a subsidy on cones, just as it gives a subsidy on barley? Can my hon. Friend ask those concerned to cone off less of the road so that a longer distance than necessary is not coned off, because it is overdone?

Mr. Bottomley: I accept part of what my hon. Friend says. We are getting better each year. I should like to quote from a letter that I received:

"I should . . . like to congratulate the contractors and Department of Transport for keeping the traffic moving in all conditions during the work."

In this case the work was on the A6. The letter continues:

"That has been no mean achievement."

We need to congratulate people when they do well, and to chastise them when they do not.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that large sections of motorway are still coned off, with no workmen in sight, and in many cases it appears to happen week after week? Will the hon. Gentleman do something about it? Will he have a look at the M62 and M63, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) referred, because the chaos in that area is appalling and something needs to be done about it?

Mr. Bottomley: The chaos is far less than it would have been if we had not gone in for a massive publicity exercise. I congratulate the many road users, commercial and domestic, who have kept away from Barton bridge while some of the work has been going on. If they continue to keep away when they can, obey the direction signs and follow the advice, we shall be able to get the work done and allow traffic to keep moving. I appreciate the problems that it causes to some of the hon. Gentleman's constituents.

Road Safety (Coaches)

11. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further steps he proposes to improve road safety, particularly in relation to coaches.

Mr. David Mitchell: I shall be consulting very soon on requirements for new coach design and equipment. Later this year we shall be ready to consult on requirements for the fitting of devices to limit the speed of all coaches.

Mr. Adley: I thank my hon. Friend for that welcome decision. Has he seen the clever but misleading propaganda emanating from the Bus and Coach Council, which provides information on the number of people killed or injured in coaches? In spite of numerous requests, it refuses to give me the information on the number of people killed or injured by coaches. Does my hon. Friend agree that that shows unusual reticence on the part of an organisation, indicating either a lack of information or a deliberate cover-up? If the council cannot provide the information, will my hon. Friend do so, so that we may have some facts by which to judge the evidence of our own eyes?

Mr. Mitchell: I have not seen the exact publication to which my hon. Friend refers, but I understand that the Bus and Coach Council will shortly be replying to a letter that it received from my hon. Friend.

Mr. Frank Field: Given the importance that drunkenness plays in the number of accidents, will the Minister tell us which other Government Departments have an interest in reducing that problem? Can he tell us whether they attach the same importance as his Department does to that end? Is he happy with Government co-ordination on that front? Can he give the House an idea of when his Department will bring forward proposals that will attempt to reduce the number of accidents caused by drunkenness?

Mr. Mitchell: Among other Government Departments, the Home Office takes a special interest. I refer the hon. Gentleman to a question that the Prime Minister answered on 3 July. Needless to say, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, who is responsible for roads, takes a special interest in that and in co-ordinating activities concerned with drunken driving.

Disabled People (Driving)

12. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department is taking to advise disabled people about driving.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department has set up MAVIS, the mobility advice and vehicle information service at Crowthorne in Berkshire, where disabled people can come for advice on their potential ability to drive and on finding a suitable vehicle. A wide range of adapted cars is available for test driving.

I shall circulate further details in the Official Report.

Mr. Stern: Will my hon. Friend congratulate the young lady concerned on her appointment? Can he tell the House about the aims of the new initiative and how much it encourages disabled people to look at the possibility of being able to drive, something which they might not have considered previously?

Mr. Bottomley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. This may not be a subject which gets people shouting across the Floor of the House, but it is important to develop disabled people's ability to drive. That often means explaining where they can go for specialist advice and to try out cars and controls. I do not want to exaggerate, but if people can see, and if their minds are working, they can probably drive. MAVIS is the person for them to talk to and she can be found at Crowthorne. Those who want to make inquiries should contact the Department of Transport and we will put them in touch with MAVIS.

Mr. Coombs: When does my hon. Friend expect to announce the results of the review that he has undertaken into the working of the orange badge regulations, which was announced in a recent parliamentary answer?

Mr. Bottomley: I cannot say precisely when, but I hope that it will be done without too much delay. If it is possible, I may circulate MAVIS' telephone number in some way.

Following is the information: MAVIS: Transport and Road Research Laboratory, Old Wokingham road, Crowthorne, BERKS 0344-77901/01-212-5257

Bus Usage (London)

13. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the latest available figures he has for bus usage in London.

Mr. David Mitchell: Provisional figures for 1985-86 show that some 1,150 million passenger journeys were made on all bus services operated for London Regional Transport.

Mr. Banks: Is it true that there has been a 10 per cent. decline in passenger mileage during the past 12 months? Why, when the London regional passenger committee, road users, bus travellers, bus drivers and the unions oppose the extension of one-person operated buses on the grounds that they lead to more traffic congestion and longer delays in journey times, do the Government insist on extending one-person operated buses throughout London?

Mr. Mitchell: As is so often the case, the hon. Gentleman is misinformed. London's buses now carry more passengers than they did in 1982 and 1983, and only 0·9 per cent. fewer than in 1984.

Mr. Banks: I was talking about this year.

Mr. Mitchell: These are the latest figures that I have. About 70 per cent. of buses are one-man operated. That figure is planned to increase to 74 per cent. by March 1987, but each stage is appraised on its merits. It is a management matter, not a Government decision.

Mr. Squire: Will my hon. Friend confirm, contrary to the impression created by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), that many of the late GLC'S fears about bus services have proved groundless and that, since the disbandment of the GLC, LRT has been much more responsive to the needs of passengers? Is he aware that LRT is examining the possibility of providing minibuses and other variations which were not considered by the GLC?

Mr. Banks: Rubbish.

Mr. Mitchell: As my hon. Friend rightly said, this is only part of a national regime in which we are witnessing a considerable increase in innovation and initiative. As for LRT, professional management and improved efficiency have meant that revenue support has halved. The result is a lower burden on London ratepayers, for which I am sure they will be grateful.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister look again at a matter to which I have brought his attention before—bus services in the docklands of London? He will know that there is grave discontent at the reduction in services, at enormous delays and often missing buses. It is an area of growing population. The Government say that the docklands are being redeveloped. It is no use, however, if they are redeveloped but there are fewer bus services to enable people to get around. Will the Minister please re-examine that, and can we have a better service?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman draws attention to the increasing population in the docklands, in regard to which I know he will welcome the Government's activities. I shall pass his comments on to the management of LRT.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the Minister consider the facts rather than the theory? Is it not a fact that, in certain areas of London, such as Stepney and Poplar, services are being cut? When asked why, local management says that it is overspending its budget and cannot afford to keep services going. Ministers set the budget for LRT, and it is then shared out. Is it not time that we had a re-examination of what is happening, instead of boasting about how much support is being provided, when funding is being cut at the expense of passengers, who desperately need bus services?

Mr. Mitchell: London Bus Ltd. is seeking to match supply and demand more closely. That means that in some areas where there is not much demand there are reductions, whereas in other areas there is an increase. Additional routes are being put into operation. It is just not the case that overall there is more than a very marginal reduction.

Channel Tunnel

14. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will discuss with him the matter of rail links between the proposed Channel tunnel and the north of England.

Mr. David Mitchell: The question of rail links between the tunnel and the north of England is a matter for British Rail to decide, but I know that it is anxious to exploit all the commercial opportunities offered by the tunnel. I understand that it is already considering the scope for through services to destinations north of London, making use of the west London line via Kensington-Olympia.

Mr. Waller: Is my hon. Friend aware that much of the latent opposition in the north of England to the concept of the Channel tunnel would evaporate if people were made aware of the fact that there will be a fast and convenient link between the north of England—particularly the north-east—and the continent? As my hon. Friend said, British Rail is already planning a link via Kensington-Olympia with the west coast main line. Will my hon. Friend ensure that Sir Robert Reid is very much aware of the considerable market that exists along the tracks of the east coast main line?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall certainly draw the attention of the chairman of British Rail to the point made by my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend will know that, as well as considerable benefits for the north of England as a result of faster through services, there are significant benefits for exporters in the north of the country in terms of freight.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Westland plc

37. Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General if he was consulted prior to the decision to send the Solicitor-General's letter of 6 January 1986 to the then Secretary of State for Defence, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) relating to the legal position of Westland.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): It is not my usual practice to disclose what communications take place between my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General and myself in relation to legal advice tendered to the Government.

Mr. Dalyell: Surely the usual practice is that Law Officers' letters are treated with extreme discretion and most gingerly by the Downing street machine. Why did the Solicitor-General's letter ever go near Mr. Ingham and the press office, unless there was a Prime Ministerial instruction that it was to be leaked?

The Attorney-General: I am quite certain that there was no such instruction.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: If there is to be a new political saga over the Westland affair, will the Attorney-General do all in his power to bear in mind that the company is now doing extremely well, is getting plenty of orders and has a very bright future? Therefore, will he do everything he can to make sure that Westland is allowed to get on with the job?

The Attorney-General: That is not a matter for me, but I welcome what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The report of the Select Committee on Defence into this matter is due for publication on Thursday week — just in time for the recess. Has the Attorney-General seen an advance copy of that report, and does he anticipate at least the possibility of prosecutions arising from the report's findings?

The Attorney-General: I have not seen the report.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the nature of that reply, I give notice that I shall seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Commercial Court

38. Mr. Ottaway asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on measures to reduce delays in the Commercial Court.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor has warmly accepted the recommendations on changes in procedure and practice contained in the recent report of the practitioner members of the Commercial Court committee. It is intended to amend the rules of court before the end of this month.

Mr. Ottaway: That is a most welcome answer, but the truth is that some cases are taking up to two and a half years to come to trial in the Commercial Court. Given that the Commercial Court is a great foreign currency earner, will the Solicitor-General please ensure that the proposals are implemented as soon as possible?

The Solicitor-General: I agree that in extreme cases there is a delay of the order that my hon. Friend mentioned. I appreciate his knowledge of the subject from his professional association with that court. It is important that all that can be done should be done to speed up matters, and I am very hopeful that the report of the practitioner members will be very useful in that regard.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Is the Solicitor-General aware that the Lord Chancellor feels that some of the delay is caused by the delay in producing a transcription of the notes? Will he take into account the fact that the equipment used by my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) is useful in that respect, and will he look at it please?

The Solicitor-General: I shall see that the hon. Gentleman's point is referred to my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor.

Lloyd's

39. Mr. Yeo asked the Attorney-General how many prosecutions have been brought in the last 12 months against members or former members of Lloyd's.

The Attorney-General: I take the question to refer to prosecutions of members of Lloyd's arising from transactions undertaken by them in that capacity. There have been no such prosecutions by the Director of Public Prosecutions during the past 12 months. I cannot speak for other prosecuting authorities.

Mr. Yeo: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that by far the best possible deterrent to potential fraudsters is the likelihood of being prosecuted successfully, leading to a conviction? Is he aware that it is offensive to many members of the public and Lloyd's that there are still at large individual former members of Lloyd's who appear to have milked their members of enormous sums?

The Attorney-General: I agree with my hon. Friend that prosecution and conviction is a good deterrent. Steady progress has been maintained by the fraud investigation group, and I am satisfied that the length of time taken is attributable to the complexity of the case and the nature of the problems, particularly of obtaining evidence from overseas, which must be overcome. All those concerned are endeavouring to bring the investigations to a satisfactory conclusion as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the Attorney-General agree that part of the problem has been the inadequacy and lack of legal back-up facilities of solicitors? Does he hope that once the Crown Prosecution Service is both fully staffed and manned in London that sort of support service will be available and will enable prosecutions to be brought far more speedily?

The Attorney-General: We have not had any lack of suitable solicitors available. On the fraud investigation group problem, counsel has been deeply involved throughout, as well as FIG itself.

Mr. Sackville: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the matter of the PCW syndicate has been as scandalous as it has been damaging to the reputation of the City of London? Will he confirm that everything possible is being done to prosecute those who are responsible?

The Attorney-General: As I said, the problem has been one of obtaining evidence from overseas. That has been the most significant difficulty. We have now managed to overcome many of the problems that confronted us earlier.

Crown Prosecution Service

40. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General to what extent he intends to answer parliamentary questions on the Crown Prosecution Service on behalf of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

The Attorney-General: I ask the House to forgive me for the length of the answer, as this is an important question.

I intend to adopt the proposals set out in the White Paper on "An Independent Prosecution Service for England and Wales". I shall therefore remain answerable in Parliament for decisions or actions that I or the Director of Public Prosecutions and his headquarters staff take on prosecution matters, and for the policy that is applied by the Crown Prosecution Service in the handling of particular cases. For the reasons given in the White Paper, however, I do not think it appropriate to answer in Parliament for the intrinsic merits of particular decisions taken by local prosecutors unless the Director's headquarters staff have in fact been involved in the case in question. In-so-far as cases in which the Director's headquarters staff have been involved are concerned, I propose to continue my existing practice, as a general rule, of confining answers to the basis of the decision in the particular case, without giving details of the evidence or other considerations which have led to a particular decision. In-so-far as cases which are handled locally are concerned, the Director has told me that he is prepared to inquire into the circumstances of particular cases to which his attention is drawn by hon. Members.

Mr. Brown: May I give a cautious welcome to that response? Is the Attorney-General aware that his recent convoluted written answer on the same subject to the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) caused some concern?

The Attorney-General: I hope that I have now cleared up any misunderstanding that there might have been.

Mr. Hind: When my right hon. and learned Friend considers the Crown Prosecution Service, will he bear in mind the present widespread disquiet among the Bar about the difference in payment for days of prosecuting in a magistrates' court between barristers and solicitors? Will he, together with the Lord Chancellor, have a look at the matter in the near future to see whether a more just settlement of that problem can be reached?

The Attorney-General: A great deal of nonsense has been talked about this. The figure of £250 a day has been widely quoted as being the sum that solicitors are likely to be paid. That is rarely paid, and when it is, it is to an experienced equity partner who takes a whole day to deal with difficult cases. Solicitors have higher overheads, and that has been recognised by the Bar.

Official Secrets Acts (Prosecutions)

41. Mr. Dubs asked the Attorney-General in how many cases since 1979 involving charges under the Official Secrets Acts he has personally taken charge of the prosecution.

The Attorney-General: Since taking office in 1979 I have personally conducted three prosecutions for offences under the Official Secrets Acts.

Mr. Dubs: Does the Attorney-General recall a film shown recently on Channel 4 called "Spying for the Comrades"? Is he aware that a Mr. Brian Gentleman, featured in that film, has since admitted on oath that he passed secrets that he obtained through his job at the Department of Trade and Industry to an official at the Czech embassy? Is he aware that, in the absence of any decision to prosecute that individual, there is a great deal of suspicion that there has been a cover-up because of incompetence by MI5?

The Attorney-General: I have not seen the programme, but I have read the exposé of the programme in The Sunday Times. I do not know of any occasion in which the person referred to gave evidence on oath. It is certainly not a cover-up.

EC Budget

42. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Attorney-General what was the outcome of the decision of the European Court on 3 July about the legality of the budget of the European Assembly; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: On 3 July this year the European Court declared void the adoption by the President of the European Parliament, on 18 December 1985, of the budget for 1986. The court further declared that this annulment of the President's act did not call in question the validity of payments made and commitments entered into, before the date of the judgment, in implementation of the purported budget. The remainder of the Council's application was dismissed.

Mr. Taylor: Following this welcome judgment about the illegality of an excess of about £400 million in the budget, will my right hon. and learned Friend say whether he was conculted by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer before my right hon. Friend went along with the other Ministers four days later and approved a budget four times as great as that originally approved by the European Assembly?

The Attorney-General: That is a matter entirely for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The most important point in this case was to establish that the budgetary procedure laid down by the treaty must be respected. This, in the court's judgment, has been done.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

44. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how he proposes to allocate the £3 million rehabilitation grant for Ethiopia, announced on 26 November 1985, Official Report, column 515; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): Some £0·9 million of the £3 million we set aside for relief and rehabilitation was used earlier this year to provide seeds and agricultural hand tools. An ODA team visited Ethiopia in May to discuss the use of the remaining £2·1 million. Following this, pesticides and spraying equipment to a value of £0·6 million were provided in June to counter an emergency pest outbreak. We shall also be providing some £1·5 million for a well rehabilitation programme and for seed production and storage.

Mr. Chapman: I am grateful for that answer and for the progress report. Is not the main problem the flight of so many Ethiopian refugees into Somalia and the consequent threat to the Somalian economy? Do we not have to face the problem that we must remove the fear of Ethiopians against the oppressive nature and policies of that regime? Does my right hon. Friend agree that for us to give money will not necessarily solve that particular and vitally crucial question?

Mr. Raison: There are many problems about Ethiopia and the nature of the regime. In the past year we have provided £750,000, through the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and Oxfam, specifically for refugees in Somalia. I have just allocated a further £800,000 for the same refugees.

World Bank

46. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met officials of the World Bank.

Mr. Raison: My right hon. and learned Friend and I had meetings with the then president of the World Bank on 13 March. My officials have also recently had separate discussions here with the two senior vice-presidents.

Mr. Yeo: Bearing in mind that last year there was a transfer of resources from developing to developed countries, does my right hon. Friend share my concern at the implications of that position for debtors, creditors and the world economy? Will he undertake to support any initiatives proposed by the World Bank designed to reverse that position?

Mr. Raison: The World Bank is concerned with this problem, and so am I. We support a generous eighth replenishment for IDA and in due course there will be a new general capital increase for the bank. Also, we welcome the proposed role of the World Bank in implementing Secretary Baker's initiative, which is to make fast disbursing loans available to support the adjustment efforts of heavily indebted countries.

Mr. Beith: Does the Minister hope to have a meeting with the new president of the World Bank before very long? Will he take the opportunity to stress that it cannot be right for the Third world to be sending more money to the World Bank than it is getting from it and that therefore it is important to get new flows to the Third world—perhaps, for example, by increasing the involvement of Japan and Japan's surplus in the World Bank?

Mr. Raison: I hope to meet the president of the World Bank before too long. As I have just said, both the World Bank and the Government are concerned about this problem, and I have outlined some of the additional resources which we believe can and should be made available to the World Bank.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Has my right hon. Friend taken the opportunity to discuss with officials of the World Bank the problem that exists as a result of the debt problem, particularly in Africa, and the fact that the most optimistic forecast by the World Bank is that African countries will be in greater debt at the end of the next decade than they are at present? Is my right hon. Friend planning with the World Bank to make available additional funds on concessionary terms in an effort to solve that problem?

Mr. Raison: We are of course concerned about the problem. Our belief is that the best approach is to focus sums of aid on those countries that are able to make adjustments to their policies so that their economies can be made effective. We shall be very happy to support them.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Is the Minister aware that in its development report 1986 the World Bank referred to the need for an increase in bilateral aid and relief for sub-Sahara? Is the Minister's Department making progress in an effort to achieve those objectives?

Mr. Raison: I am very concerned about finding opportunities in Africa where we can give the kind of aid that will help to produce good results. Almost certainly that means aid that is matched by effective policy reforms.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Before my right hon. Friend authorises additional credit for developing countries, will he examine the extent to which their economic plight has been self-inflicted by years of mismanagement? Will he be very careful not to underwrite mistaken policies or to bail out those who are responsible for them?

Mr. Raison: It is very important to match aid with policies that are likely to prove effective. The encouraging aspect of the special session of the United Nations on Africa that was held in May was that the African countries themselves were prepared to be analytical about their own policies and in some cases their own policy failures.

Central America

47. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he intends to increase United Kingdom official development assistance to central America.

Mr. Raison: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Holland: Does the Minister really think that it is right that inter-American Development Bank loans to Nicaragua should be frozen because of the concern of the United States to destabilise the democratically elected Government of that country? Further, does he oppose the United States Administration in their efforts now to gain a veto over all inter-American Development Bank lending? Does he think it right that a superpower should be able to dominate such a regional development bank, as if there had been no end to the Monroe doctrine? Will he take advantage of the coming recess to visit Central America, including Nicaragua, to evaluate the situation for himself?

Mr. Raison: I have no plans to visit Nicaragua, but our view about inter-American Development Bank loans has always been that they should be made on the basis of objective economic analysis.

Mr. Forman: Although it may not be appropriate to increase United Kingdom official development assistance to countries in that part of the world, does my right hon. Friend look favourably upon the prospect of increasing assistance through the European development fund or other European instruments?

Mr. Raison: The European Community is interested in giving aid to Central America and, among other countries, it gives quite a substantial amount of aid to Nicaragua. There is no doubt that the Community is looking in that direction, and with the accession of Spain it is likely that there will be more pressure to spend aid funds in Latin America.

Mr. Deakins: What are the obstacles to Britain giving more bilaterial aid to Nicaragua?

Mr. Raison: I do not think that there are obstacles, but it is a matter of priorities. Our priorities are to aid the poorest countries and Nicaragua is not one of the poorest countries. We focus our aid to a considerable extent on countries with which we have a long, traditional connection.

Gujerat

48. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to provide aid for the state of Gujerat, India for the year 1986.

Mr. Raison: In 1986 we expect to complete expenditure of the £43 million committed to the construction of two fertiliser plants at Hazira in Gujerat. We shall also continue our £2 million support for the integrated rural development project in Anand, which is helping to improve community health and family welfare in some 200 villages in Gujerat.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware of the great concern felt among the Gujerati community in this country at the suffering being experienced in the state of Gujerat due to the ravages of natural miseries that keep occurring, and to which none of the Minister's proposed resources apply? Is there no hope, for example, of matching aid being made available if the community in Britain raises money in order to help those who are suffering in the state of Gujerat?

Mr. Raison: We consider joint funding schemes from charitable organisations, and are always willing to do so but in respect of official aid we have to respond to the priorities set down by the Indian Government, and we cannot go behind their backs and come up with our own programmes.

Africa (Front-line States)

49. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the aid to Africa is designated for front-line states adjoining South Africa.

Mr. Raison: In 1985, 13 per cent. of gross bilateral aid for African countries was provided to those front-line states adjoining South Africa, Botswana, Zimbabwe and Mozambique.

Mr. Hughes: Might not one way of helping the situation in southern Africa be to increase the aid budget to the front-line states, which would then be better able to resist any action by South Africa, should that country feel itself to be under any pressure as a result of policies that the Government may then, we hope, be able to introduce?

Mr. Raison: We have recently, both through the Southern African development co-ordination conference and bilaterally, stepped up our offers of aid to exactly those countries. That aid includes, for example, important transport projects in Mozambique.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Is it not preposterous of Opposition Members to call for more aid to states that are blackguarding Britain across the world? Will the Government give an assurance that there will be no extra aid granted because of sanctions against South Africa?

Mr. Raison: As I have said, our policy is to try to build up the economies of those countries in the region in order to decrease their dependence on South Africa. I expect that policy to continue.

MI5

3.31 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise directly out of questions?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: In the presence of the Attorney-General, I should like to give you notice, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to raise a point of order on the MI5 matter that was dealt with in the newspapers during the weekend.

Mr. Speaker: If points of order do not arise directly out of questions, I shall take them after the statement and the Standing Order No. 10 application.

Environmental Initiative (UK 2000)

3.32 pm

The Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government (Mr. William Waldegrave): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has today launched, in association with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Employment and for Wales, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, a new initiative to encourage more local environmental improvement work by both volunteers and Manpower Services Commission community programme teams. My right hon. Friend informed the House of the general terms of this initiative in answer to a question from the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) on 20 June.

The initiative will provide a focus for new projects which improve the environment and create jobs. It will involve a wide range of environmental action. It will include the Government, voluntary organisations and the private sector and will link with other Government initiatives concerned with the environment and with job creation. It will tackle problems of the built and the natural environment, in both town and country, and be concerned with both improving the environment and enhancing people's enjoyment of it. It will aim to provide challenging work and training for those participating. It will also aim to create worthwhile new jobs, both in the improvement projects themselves and in the new enterprises that some projects will help to generate.

The right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has invited a number of established national voluntary organisations to act as agents in launching the initiative. These are the British Trust for Conservation Volunteers, The Civic Trust, Community Service Volunteers, the Groundwork Foundation, the Keep Britain Tidy Group, and the Royal Society for Nature Conservation. I expect that others will join later. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales will be holding similar discussions with appropriate organisations in Scotland and Wales.

The agents will promote programmes of work and assist the establishment of local projects. I hope that such projects will have the support of local authorities, local business and local residents. Initially, work will be concentrated on the five important themes of greening the cities, conserving the industrial heritage, tackling litter, helping tourists on the move, and making more of nature.

A new organisation is being established, outside the Government, to promote the whole initiative, to determine priorities, to seek business sponsorship and to monitor performance. This new organisation, to be called UK 2000, will be directed by a board on which participating voluntary organisations will be represented together with a number of independent members. Richard Branson, chairman of the Virgin Group, has agreed to be the chairman of this board. The other independent board members who will serve in a personal capacity, will be Jean Denton, head of external relations at the Rover Group; Ernest Hall of Dean Clough Halifax; John Pontin of Bristol 1000; and Stephen O'Brien of Business in the Community.

The Department of the Environment will pay grants to the participating agents and the new organisation to a total of around £750,000 in 1986-87, and at least at that level in the next two years. I am confident that business sponsorship will augment these resources. In addition, the Manpower Services Commission will contribute through the community programme the costs of providing temporary jobs for long-term unemployed people, which it is estimated will amount to £22 million in a full year.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Given the massive problems of dereliction, decay and neglect, additional initiatives, however modest, are worthwhile. We wish this one success, but it appears unlikely to have a major impact on the environment or the creation of jobs.

Is the Minister aware that there is little of substance in what he has to had to say to the House today? What, if any, additional financial resources, over and above existing departmental budgets, will be allocated as a result of the statement? How many additional places will the MSC create as a result of the announcement? Will any extra permanent jobs result?

Why, given that the local authorities are and will remain the major agencies for all the work, have there been no discussions or consultations of any kind with the local authority associations about the scheme?

Has not each of the policy areas—greening the cities, conserving our heritage, tackling litter and making more of nature, whatever that might mean — suffered dramatically because of the massive reductions, now totalling £17·5 billion, in rate support grant as a result of the Government's policies?

Does the Minister recall that the Secretary of State for the Environment, when Secretary of State for Transport, issued a circular, to take effect from 1 April this year, which urged local authorities to remove all litter bins from all-purpose trunk roads? Does he recall that the same circular recommended local authorities not to scavenge roads, not to sweep them and not to remove litter? That was Government policy announced in April. What has changed?

Will the Minister explain to the House what impact the initiative will have, given that the Government have reduced the three grant-related expenditure assessments for refuse collection, refuse disposal and environmental works by 10 per cent. in real terms in the past seven years?

Given that full-time jobs have been lost, particularly in the local authorities, is this not just another example of the Government undermining full-time employment and replacing it by temporary, lowly paid work of a part-time and non-permanent nature?

Finally, is it not inadequate in every sense to meet the real needs of any one of those policy areas to make this announcement today? Is it not totally inadequate to tackle all of them together? Why do the Government not restore some of the cuts that they have imposed on local authorities and let them get on with the job?

Mr. Waldegrave: If that was a welcome from the hon. Gentleman, I should not like to hear what he says when he is trying to send his guests away. However, I was grateful for the way in which he started. No one says that this initiative will solve all the problems, but it will be useful, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for confirming that fact.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the rate support grant and GREAs. As he knows, the Audit Commission has shown that there are enourmous savings to be made in local authorities' spending on refuse disposal and collection. We hope that those economies, without loss of service, can still be made.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his Budget speech, announced 35,000 additional community programme places. This takes up 5,000 of those places.

Dr. Cunningham: New places?

Mr. Waldegrave: It is 5,000 of the additional places announced for next year. We aim to focus and use those in a coherent and sensible programme.

In addition, there are the lesser sums that I reported coming from the Department of the Environment——

Dr. Cunningham: New money?

Mr. Waldegrave: —from the Department of the Environment's budget for the grants to voluntary organisations and for the small central staff.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) has written to local authority leaders to urge them to participate in the scheme and to offer discussions about it. I hope that the leaders will take up that offer.

Sir Paul Hawkins (Norfolk, South-West): I am delighted that the scheme is getting off the ground, and I am sorry that the Opposition are so damning with faint praise about it. I am glad that the British Trust for Conservation Volunteers—an excellent body—is to be part of the new body.

Will my hon. Friend work closely with the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to make sure that there is not only a thriving countryside, but a thriving agriculture, without which there is no possibility of the countryside being alive and available to tourists and holidaymakers to enjoy?

Will my hon. Friend work closely with the Council of Europe's Campaign for the Countryside 1987-88, in which, I believe, a member of his staff is taking part?

Mr. Waldegrave: The answer to my hon. Friend's final question is yes. I am grateful to him for emphasising the importance of work in the countryside. Earlier this year my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I jointly announced a farm and countryside initiative, using community programme places. That will run alongside the new initiative; a complementary programme is already in place.

I agree with my hon. Friend that it would have been nice if we had had a general welcome for the initiative. I hope that it will get a general welcome in the country, even if the professional Oppositions have to oppose it.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Does the hon. Gentleman not realise that while any initiative is welcome and partnership funding is welcome, we have so far heard that there is either no extra money or a minuscule amount of extra money, and that there will be no new jobs or only a minuscule number of new jobs? As long as announcements are all presentation and no policy, they are bound to be criticised. Can the hon. Gentleman tell us how many new jobs will be created and how much of the £22 million is new money?

Would it not have been better, more effective and less bureaucratic to put a new environmental programme into, for example, the urban programme and to use local authorities and their staff as part of the implementation process? Even at this late stage, will the hon. Gentleman guarantee that local authorities will be consulted so that the initiative can be effectively delivered, without bureaucratic and administrative diversion, and so that we can see an improvement in the urban environment and not just a method of publicising the Government's apparent but belated conversion to environmental policy?

Mr. Waldegrave: It ill-behoves a representative of the Liberal party to complain about something being presentation without policy, but I let that pass. It was slightly surprising that the hon. Gentleman should suggest that this small organisation would be a new bureaucracy and that it would have been better to put the money into the local authorities' pot. The new organisation will involve some very able people who are willing to give up time to do some useful work for the community. I hope and believe that it will be a success.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): Is my hon. Friend aware that his announcement will be warmly welcomed in Cinderford, a town in my constituency in the Forest of Dean? Is he aware that Cinderford is sorely troubled by marauding sheep and their droppings, which are deliberately scattered on the pavements and pastures? Can UK 2000 assist in clearing up the mess?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am baffled, because my hon. Friend tells me of the sheep's intentions by using the word "deliberately". I do not think that my hon. Friend's problem will be the first project for UK 2000, but I shall draw it to the attention of the chairman of the board to see whether he has any useful suggestions.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Is the Minister aware that his Government are turning tragedy into farce? They have handed over their responsibility for foreign aid to Bob Geldof and cut foreign aid dramatically. They have handed over part of their responsibility for the National Health Service to Jimmy Savile, and are handing local responsibility for collecting refuse to Mr. Branson to cut the money needed for street cleaning. May we have an assurance that the Government do not intend to hand over responsibility for law and order to Perry Mason, to Kojak or to Boy George? Does the Minister realise that these ridiculous palliatives will be recognised for what they are by the British people?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am not sure whether it is all that clever to make jokes about Boy George, but that is for the hon. Gentleman to judge, with his usual good taste. I think that the hon. Gentleman is wrong. Some people with flair and imagination will be helping people to work at some of the problems which common sense tells us must be tackled.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Do the things about which my hon. Friend has told us come within local government responsibilities? Does he agree that we do not need more money to be spent, but that we need a bit more competence by local authorities and a bit more attention to their basic duties? On our doorsteps at Westminster, litter is a disgrace.

Mr. Waldegrave: The initiative will tackle matters which go wider than local authority responsibility.

Anyway, I think that it is thoroughly good to have some competition in these matters. I expect that the organisation will come up with some ideas about which local authorities have not thought. There is plenty of room for local authority participation, and I hope that some will participate.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is this not just a further example of Prime Ministerial gimmickry, which seems more likely to be geared to securing a knighthood for Richard Branson than to clearing the litter from our streets? Will the Minister answer the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham)? Instead of indulging in gimmickry, why do the Government not provide extra resources for local authorities so that they can deal with the problems in the inner cities? However, if we are to have it, may I have an undertaking that at least one of the teams will be in Newham?

Mr. Waldegrave: That is usual. The hon. Gentleman says that a scheme is a disgrace from start to finish, but then asks for it to operate in Newham. I thank him for the compliment. I look forward to the hon. Gentleman refusing his knighthood in 30 years' time. Much of the initiative covers areas outside local government responsibility. Local government has plenty of resources, and this will add usefully to them.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): Does my hon. Friend accept that a high proportion of litter on our suburban high streets is discarded food and drink containers? Will he reflect on the undesirability of eating in the streets and perhaps make regulations for fast food takeaways?

Mr. Waldegrave: The Keep Britain Tidy Group, which is part of the venture, has done a lot of work with fast food chains to ensure that litter bins are placed outside their shops. The board will be tackling such practical and sensible ideas.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): How much of the £22 million will come to Scotland, and how many new jobs will be created in Scotland? How many of Mr. Branson's colleagues on the board—I did not catch the names—are Scottish and how many are Welsh? Do the Government intend to set up similar committees to manage the gimmick in Scotland and Wales?

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland are discussing the matter with voluntary organisations to see how best to pursue this in Scotland and Wales. Doubtless they will make some announcement in due course.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I congratulate my hon. Friend on this initiative, which will harness the undoubted goodwill that exists outside Government and quasi-government organisations towards environmental initiatives. May I ask my hon. Friend to reject the sour attitude of the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and others who believe that the only worthwhile environmental initiative is one that employs local government officers?

Mr. Waldegrave: I agree with my hon. Friend. However, I do not believe that the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) takes the attitude that my hon. Friend says, because he welcomes the work done by the Keep Britain Tidy Group and others. This initiative is a useful focus for getting some of these groups together, providing some new community programme places and providing a focus for imaginative schemes. I do not see how anybody can think that it is anything other than a good idea.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Does the Minister not feel that this is a dim and distorted echo of the afforestation programme of the Roosevelt Administration, which did so much, so well, so long ago, but that in fact it will create a minute number of jobs? Will the Minister tell us how many of the 5,000 jobs which he says can be expected to flow from it will be permanent?

Mr. Waldegrave: We hope, as in all community programme schemes, that there are some permanent jobs. I am not making any unreasonable claims. Everybody in this country, in my experience, believes that there is a problem of clearing up the country. There are plenty of unemployed youngsters, so why not put the two together?

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Is my hon. Friend aware that one reason why the River Skerne in Darlington is so polluted and litter-strewn is that the task of clearing it up falls between the Northumbrian water authority and the Darlington borough council? If this sort of imaginative initiative can cut through those local bureaucracies it will be very welcome to my constituents.

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right. There are plenty of local authorities doing a good job, but there are plenty of others which use the sort of excuse that my hon. Friend mentions for not being as imaginative as they could be. I cannot see how anybody can do anything other than welcome an additional player with some additional money in this area.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Is it not the case that all schemes to improve the environment, such as this or other schemes are welcome because it is a good cause in itself? Will my hon. Friend take note of the fact that the scheme must embrace a much wider area than simply litter, because clearly the main answer to that problem, as my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) has said on many occasions, is a more aggressive policy on prosecution?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right on that point. However, contrary to what the press has said in the leaks about this, it goes much wider than litter. I hope that we will soon get away from that and see some rather imaginative and different proposals which will take the initiative forward in the future.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I shall call the three hon. Members who have been rising.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): Is my hon. Friend aware that if those who are unemployed and work on these schemes are given help to get work that can often be very successful? Under the Bedfordshire rural community council, at one stage 58 out of 70 people on a similar scheme had been moved into mainstream jobs.

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. and learned Friend is right. I have been associated with schemes in Bristol; for example, the Brunel engine shed, which has community programme volunteers working on it, some of whom have got permanent jobs out of it. It is always difficult to predict how many. However, they are valuable schemes in themselves and they often lead to good and permanent jobs.

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): Is my hon. Friend aware that this initiative will be very welcome to the residents of Bolton, and especially to the Bolton chamber of commerce, which has repeatedly called for such an initiative, pointing out that cleaning up our inner cities is good for morale and good for inward investment in the parts of the country that most need it?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right. People outside the Chamber listening to the sour response of the Opposition will say that they are listening to an example of the "not invented here" syndrome.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Will my hon. Friend ensure that part of the remit of Mr. Branson is to ensure that some of his people go into schools and teach children not to throw litter, as the teachers have abdicated their responsibility in that respect? It would be a good thing if we eliminated the problem at an early stage, through the schools.

Mr. Waldegrave: For better or worse, I suspect that Mr. Branson has rather more pull when it comes to persuading youngsters to do things than have some of the distinguished Opposition Members who are facing me.

Commonwealth Games

3.54 pm

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the threat to the Commonwealth games caused by the Government's continuing refusal to implement effective sanctions against South Africa."

You turned down a similar request last Thursday, Mr. Speaker, but the matter has become more urgent since then. Five countries have definitely withdrawn from the Commonwealth games — Ghana, Nigeria, Kenya, Uganda and Tanzania — and unless the British Government take action now against the South African Government there is a strong possibility of other black African countries and Asian countries, such as India, boycotting them. Indeed, the very existence of the games, which are due to start next week, could be endangered.

Yesterday the Commonwealth Games Federation took the correct decision of banning the South Africans, Zola Budd and Annette Cowley, but the black African countries are rightly demanding effective action by the British Government against the South African Government. The people of Scotland and other parts of the United Kingdom are demanding such action as well, and over 30 Members from various parts of the United Kingdom have signed early-day motion 1100, which stands in my name and which is to that effect. If we are to judge from the weekend statement by a former Tory Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), there is at least some support on the Conservative benches for more effective measures.

In 1970, when the Commonwealth games were last held in Scotland, they were hailed throughout the world as the friendly games. Many young people, both black and white, came together at Meadowbank stadium from all parts of the Commonwealth in a spirit of sport and friendship. That friendship, which reflected the unity of the Commonwealth, is now endangered by a spoilsport at No. 10 Downing street, who is putting her misplaced loyalty to President Botha before the loyalty of the United Kingdom to its many friends throughout the Commonwealth. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider my application.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the threat to the Commonwealth games caused by the Government's refusal to implement effective sanctions against South Africa."

I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has had to say, but I must take into account the various criteria laid down in the Standing Order. I regret that I do not consider the matter which he has raised as appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Later——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Further to the application under Standing Order No. 10 by my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan), can you advise the House of the best way in which to ensure that the Home Office re-examines the nationality status of Miss Zola Budd? Clearly the Commonwealth Game Federation has found something seriously wanting in her nationality status, and it has referred to the fraud by which she received that nationality. Can you advise us how the Home Secretary can be brought to the House and made to comment on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: It is not for me to advise the hon. Gentleman on tactics. There are many other opportunities for the hon. Gentleman to make his point.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you advise me on the matter of hon. Members making applications under Standing Order No. 10? The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) has raised a matter which is not within the control of the House or the Government. Is it right that hon. Members should parade political views on the Floor of the House when the matters in question have nothing to do with the Government? If the Commonwealth Games Federation is foolish enough to expel various people from the games, that is not a matter for the House. The hon. Gentleman is wasting our time.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members frequently raise matters under Standing Order No. 10 about which they are deeply concerned. I have to rule whether such applications should have precedence over the Orders of the Day.

Social Security Bill

3.57 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not an abuse of the prerogative of the House that the Secretary of State for Social Services is unwilling to make a statement and has instead been reduced to trailing in the press the concessions that he proposes to make in another place to stave off a further mauling of his Social Security Bill? Is it not a constitutional outrage that amendments which were debated in depth during 160 hours of committal proceedings in this place, and which were voted down by the Government, should now be dumped unceremoniously in another place cynically to try to head off another massive defeat over the ending of free school meals for half a million children of low-income families?

As the Bill is so shot through with inconsistencies and botched up compromises, is it not time that the Secretary of State had the courage to admit to the House that the Bill commands no writ beyond the confines of his party Whip, has no electoral mandate and is roundly detested by the majority of the population? Surely he should now withdraw it, or resign?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that none of this is a matter for me. The Bill is in another place, and no doubt it will return to this House with Lords amendments, but I do not know when that will be.

MI5

3.59 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to raise the matter of the revelations about MI5 in the newspapers last week. At the beginning of this point of order I should like to make it clear that I do not intend to veer into areas in which you may want to rule me out of order, in so far as I may refer to matters specifically subject to the injunction.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before we progress too far in this matter I must state that, initially, I cannot see that this has anything to do with me.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: There have been three successive hearings in the courts and the Attorney-General has succeeded in taking out injunctions against The Guardian and The Observer to prevent them from repeating allegations made in an article in The Observer on 22 June. That article was written by David Leigh and Paul Lashmar.

I have been informed—as all other hon. Members would have been informed if they had read the newspapers at the weekend—that last week an Australian journal—the Australian Financial Review—referred to MI5 activities at international conferences and in London. I have also learnt that the CBS, in a national radio programme in Sydney, made a statement in which Mr. Richard Hall discussed certain aspects of Harold Wilson's premiership.

This is a ridiculous situation. We are unable to discuss the buggings, yet the Australians can discuss the matter in their Parliament. They are free to discuss matters that are subject to court proceedings in this country, yet we are not allowed to discuss those matters here. Is it not time that the sub judice rule was examined as it relates to this House? Surely hon. Members should be unshackled and free to debate issues which are freely debated in other Parliaments—in this case, the Australian Parliament, which is a Commonwealth country?

I do not expect, Mr. Speaker, that you, will be able to rule precisely today. However, these are serious matters. It is fundamentally wrong that I, as a Back-Bench Member, and my hon. Friends cannot ask questions about issues relating to the activities of MI5 in this country, when politicians in the Australian Parliament are free to raise such matters and ask questions and receive answers in their Parliament. A distinction must be made, and we must examine these matters carefully.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must appreciate that I am not responsible for anything that happens in the Australian Parliament. He may be correct in his submission, but that is not a matter of order; it is a matter for debate. If the hon. Gentleman will try his luck in an Adjournment debate, I shall try to be present to hear him.

BILL PRESENTED

TELECOMMUNICATIONS (AMENDMENT)

Mr. Chris Smith, supported by Mr. Derek Fatchett, Mr. Doug Hoyle and Mr. Ian Mikardo, presented a Bill to amend the Telecommunications Act 1984 to give the Director of OFTEL the power to publish reports and to make recommendations and to give him the duty to secure compliance with his recommendations: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 24 October and to be printed. [Bill 206.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the Draft Development Board for Rural Wales (Extinguishment of Liabilities) Order 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Maude.]

Agriculture and the Rural Economy

4.5 pm

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): I beg to move,

That this House notes the uncertainty felt by agricultural and related industries due to the need to reduce the production of commodities in surplus, and the problems that reduction in agricultural activity and employment can cause to the rural economy and rural infrastructure generally; and urges the Government to set out its policy towards agriculture and the rural economy in a White Paper or similar document.

Last week, my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) remarked that if an hon. Member was lucky enough to win a ballot allowing him to introduce a motion, he would become a statistic. Having won a similar ballot 18 months ago, I suppose that I am a statistic twice over. Some would say that I am lucky. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I must be extremely lucky winning two ballots and representing England's most famous constituency, with its renowned coalfield, agriculture and heritage.

Today's debate on agriculture and the rural economy is timely because Britain and our European partners, along with the other major food-producing nations, face a surplus of unwanted food. The production record of British farmers during the past 45 years is unrivalled by any other industry in this country. Can any hon. Member honestly say that 10 years ago he would have predicted this crisis of over-production? Today our vital agriculture industry is marking time at the crossroads, waiting patiently for a directive from the Minister, on which road to follow.

Looking beyond today, what will we see? Will there be production quotas for farm products in surplus or will we see land set aside, or alternative uses? Perhaps a lower input system of farming will be considered alongside the demand for organically produced food. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary need only remember one thing in making a decision and that is to sustain farmers' incomes at a viable level.

Last year's 43 per cent. fall in net farm income brought 20 per cent. of British farmers to near bankruptcy. That must not be repeated unless we wish to see the complete destruction of the rural economy and ancillary industries. Many of those industries, especially the machinery manufacturers, are already suffering through lack of orders. This, plus agriculture's uncertain future, could threaten the jobs of the 800,000 people employed in the supply and processing industries, which are largely dependent on agriculture for their inputs or outputs.

The traumatically imposed milk quotas in 1984 clearly showed the dangers to our ancillary industries by the closures of creameries in the traditional dairying parts of Britain with the resulting loss of jobs. The dairy industry — the farmers and manufacturers — is dreading the consequences of a further 3 per cent. cut in milk production. The European Community buying-in programme at 18p a litre will meet a lack of response. Why sell one's right to a steady income when the alternatives are in surplus? I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister recognises that and ups the figure to at least 27p per litre. That will have the required effect and give the Minister an additional quota to redistribute among the small and medium-sized dairy farmers hardest hit by the imposition of dairy quotas in 1984.

For grassland farmers, the alternatives will possibly be beef or sheep production, but with the review of the variable premium scheme — which is under discussion and on which the outcome is uncertain—this is not the time for such farmers to make a fundamental change in farming practice. During the past three years' Community price-fixing negotiations, our variable scheme has been protected by the Minister, but at what cost to the other commodity sectors?

In the subsequent trade-off, the imposition and acceptance of milk quotas by some member countries was achieved only after accepting some of our production quota in return for Britain's retention of the variable premium scheme. Does my right hon. Friend intend the results of the beef and sheepmeat review to become a permanent feature of the common agricultural policy instead of accepting the trade-off with our partners, who know only too well of our commitment to this scheme, which gives consumers the advantage of cheaper lamb and beef instead of putting it into further store?

The problems of agriculture are not confined to the livestock sector, but face the arable farmers as well. Cereal over-production is currently being pursued by a lower price mechanism; a 20 per cent. price reduction during the past two years has resulted in increased yields compensating the loss in price. That has exacerbated the problem. In addition, we have the iniquitous 3 per cent. co-responsibility levy, introduced on 1 July. A similar levy on milk production failed miserably, so why compound the failure rate — or is it, as producers suspect, the means of sustaining the gravy train for the fat cats accommodated in Brussels?

I can tell my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary that farmers prefer an honest, straightforward price reduction that can be understood and seen to be fair throughout the Community. The present confusion in the cereals market as to who should be paying the levy is only the beginning of another sorry saga, part of which was revealed last week when the Commission decided that Scottish farmers rolling their own oats for making porridge would be subject to the levy. First it was whisky, now it is porridge, and before December we shall have a levy on catching haggis.

The Minister must surely recognise by now that the only way to contain the cereal mountain is by quota or annual licence. It is madness to spend on storage money intended for producers. Simple common sense tells me that we can pay farmers more for producing less, thus eliminating the storage charges and have millions of pounds left over to pay farmers to go into other types of farming, instead of paying farmers to go out of certain products, which then upsets those traditional producers and markets. The inability of the EEC to manage the common agricultural policy properly and efficiently has brought agriculture into disrepute with British taxpayers, and will eventually see the end of the CAP in its present form.

I now refer to the subject of sugar beet and the important matter of the future of the United Kingdom sugar industry, currently being considered by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. While I do not wish to comment on the British Sugar ownership issue itself, other than to say that I see an overall benefit in EEC terms in a unified United Kingdom sugar industry, I want to speak on the position of beet growers, whatever the eventual outcome of the present situation. Given any practical solution that I can foresee, our 11,600 beet growers will still be selling their beet to a monopoly processor. They have no other outlet for their beet, which is a vital break crop in the arable rotation, and vital also to the many people associated with its production cycle.

That, of course, has been the situation ever since the Government divested themselves of their shareholding in the original British Sugar Corporation some six years ago. My beet-growing constituents tell me that the generally harmonious relationship that they have subsequently enjoyed with the present owners, S. and W. Beresford, was largely based on a series of undertakings offered by Beresford at the time, to both the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and to growers through the National Farmers Union.

However, other than an undertaking to operate British Sugar as a separate business within the Beresford group, those undertaking have no legal basis, and as things now stand, any new owner of British Sugar could change those arrangements substantially, with growers powerless to stop them. That possibility could represent an intolerable abuse of a monopoly position, and it can be resolved only by those same undertakings, details of which I understand have already been submitted by the NFU in its evidence to the MMC, being incorporated as legally binding on whomsoever eventually gains control of British Sugar. Only in that way will the legitimate long-term rights and interests of beet growers and those who work in the processing factories be adequately safeguarded and protected.

While growing food will remain the prime job of the farmer, food production is not the only demand that the public have of the countryside. We need to create income and jobs through a network of small businesses in the rural communities. There are opportunities, to be developed by farmers, providing facilities for tourism, recreation, and farm shops based on the existing farm businesses. Farmers represent a large proportion of established rural businesses and as such have a head start in seizing a wide range of new business opportunities in the countryside. Those opportunities will lead to a requirement for more Government support in the form of development and advice. I am sure that we have the right vehicle for that through our Agricultural and Development Advisory Service. The initial message surely must be to diversify and prosper.

Agriculture in England and Wales is faced not only with short-term economic problems but with long-term uncertainty. I accept that the Government cannot make individual decisions on cropping and stocking for 200,000 farmers, but such decisions are heavily influenced by Government policy. I believe that it is reasonable for the Government now to give farmers a clear lead as to the direction in which they will be expected to go in future.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) on the choice of motion for this afternoon's debate. He has chosen an important issue. I can see that a large number of hon. Members wish to speak on it.

I start by assuring my hon. Friend that the Government fully recognise the pressures that the farming industry is facing, and the challenge that they present. In the main, as my hon. Friend admitted, those pressures flow from the need to control the production of commodities in surplus within the Community, as the motion recognises. The problem has arisen as a result of the success of agriculture in applying advances in technology and techniques. That has happened not just in Europe, but around the world, so that countries such as India and China, which once appeared to be large export markets, are now self-sufficient or even exporting.

Europe's surpluses are a major burden on the Community budget. The stocks include: almost 18 million tonnes of cereals, 1·2 million tonnes of butter, 800,000 tonnes of skimmed milk powder, and 600,000 tonnes of beef. The Community cannot afford to allow the surpluses to continue. The budgetary cost, the problems of disposal and the adverse effect on our relations with third countries all make it essential that we bring supply into better balance with demand. That is now being widely recognised throughout the Community. At its recent meeting in The Hague, the European Council agreed that the Community "must continue to adapt the CAP to the changed circumstances".

"a better control of total production must be ensured so that it is better adjusted to the market situation with the result that the share of public expenditure claimed by agriculture can be reduced".

These views of the European Council will be important in the approach which the Community adopts to the CAP in the coming weeks and months.

The pricefixing this year has sustained the tough measures which started with milk quotas in 1984, followed by restraint on wine in 1985, and now cereals where support for feedwheat has fallen by as much as 7 per cent. and where a co-responsibility levy is being applied. Year by year, support prices in real terms have been cut—on average by more than 3 per cent. a year in the past three years.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): When will the Government bring to the House the order under which we shall have the opportunity to debate in detail the co-responsibility levy on cereals? Why has the matter been put off so long when there is great uncertainty about how it is to be operated?

Mrs. Fenner: When answering questions last week, my right hon. Friend said that it will be brought forward just as soon as possible. The EC directive was ambiguous. Until it is clearer, we cannot bring it to the House.

The price fixing also included tough measures for other commodities with cuts for products such as olive oil, tobacco and fruit, which are a charge on the Community budget ranging up to 7 per cent. Taking all of the changes to support measures into account, expenditure this year was reduced by 320 million ecu or about £200 million, and next year by 457 million ecu, or £286 million.

At the same time, we ensured that United Kingdom producers had the benefit of modest green pound devaluations, and we avoided discriminatory limits on the beef and ewe premiums and discriminatory exemptions on the cereals co-responsibility levy.

We want to ensure that our farmers can continue to prosper from their own efforts and enterprises. Our continuing commitment to agriculture is demonstrated by the positive steps we take, including spending £2·2 billion on agricultural support last year and introducing substantial improvements in the hill livestock compensatory amounts arrangements. We have extended the scheme to pay HLCAs to farmers in the new less-favoured areas for the first time. I know that that has been of considerable help to farmers in the marginal areas. We have also this year increased overall HLCA payments by some 11 per cent. Total Government support in this financial year is expected to be about £110 million throughout the United Kingdom. This is a very significant contribution to ensuring the continuation of livestock farming in the hill and upland areas, thereby helping to sustain the rural economy.

We took special action last year by making available some £16·9 million to assist those livestock farmers who had been most seriously affected by the exceptionally bad summer weather. As a result, suckler cow and sheep producers in many parts of the less favoured areas and dairy farmers in certain more limited areas benefited from a significant injection of cash to help them through the winter. We have also sustained the variable premium scheme for beef.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): The Minister has detailed the Government's spending record, but does she agree that, at the end of this financial year, less will have been put into agriculture than last year? Will she take this opportunity to answer the important point raised by the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart), who said that it is important for the development of agriculture that as much advantage as possible should be taken of research and advisory services? How do the Government hope to sustain agriculture in marginal areas such as mine when they are introducing a charging system for advice for the very marginal farmers who need it most? Surely that flies in the face of what she has just argued.

Mrs. Fenner: Perhaps I might develop my argument in support of the Government's commitment to agriculture and pursue the hon. Gentleman's comments on research and development a little later.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood said, the measures that I have outlined did not prevent farm income falling by 43 per cent. last year, but that was mainly the result of the bad weather, and it followed an increase of 35 per cent. in 1984 when we had exceptionally good weather. We do not pretend that agriculture is having an easy time, but the need to change has to be faced and we are only part way into the readjustments which are needed.

Farmers everywhere—in Europe, in the USA and in other major producing countries—face the same need for change. Our farmers must play their part, but we will not accept measures which discriminate against us because our industry is efficient. We believe that, with a fair application of restraint measures, our agriculture will respond with vigour and continue to prosper.

We recognise that price policy alone is not enough in securing the necessary adjustments. This is why we want to have the idea of taking cereals land out of production fully examined within the Community. That could help to speed the necessary changes and help the producers worst affected by price restraint.

We already help farming to adapt to new and changing circumstances through the farm capital grant schemes. That support has been continued in substantial form in the present agriculture improvement scheme, which we introduced last autumn and which puts emphasis on helping smaller farmers and farmers in the less-favoured areas.

An important new strand in our policy for securing the future of farming—and one which recognises the strong link between agriculture and the rural economy—is, of course, that of farm diversification. The new agriculture improvement scheme already incorporates a totally new grant for farm tourism and craft investments. This grant covers a wide range of projects from tourism and recreation to crafts and light industry in the less-favoured areas. It is based on the premise that farmers possess the buildings, land and collateral which can be developed to the benefit of the rural community as a whole. This aid is backed by advice from the ADAS socio-economic group.

The recent debates on the Agriculture Bill have also shown that there is very strong support for the idea of aid for an even wider range of ancillary farm-based businesses. The Government have recognised that support, and responded to it positively by introducing their own amendment to the Bill which would permit Agriculture Ministers to make grants towards ancillary businesses defined by order. I very much hope that the availability of such a power will provide a valuable extension of our support for farming and the rural economy.

Sir Paul Hawkins (Norfolk, South-West): Can my hon. Friend assure me that, even if research is cut in some areas, that into alternative crops will be stepped up? We may find, for example, that converting areas from wheat growing into woodland might produce a saving by the time that storage costs and the cost of maintaining woodlands have been calculated. We should also consider land for industrial uses. Crops for plastics, for example, might not be wanted at the moment, but will my hon. Friend at least assure me that research into such matters will be stepped up?

Mrs. Fenner: We shall rely on the advice of the priorities board, which is establishing priorities for research. The Centre for Agricultural Strategy recently had an interesting seminar which we supported. The priorities board will take account of alternative uses of land.

We must avoid putting unnecessary impediments in the way of farmers who wish to diversify. I have mentioned our amendment to the Agriculture Bill concerning ancillary services. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has taken very positive steps to encourage local planning authorities to consider sympathetically applications to use redundant farm buildings for minor industrial and craft purposes that are compatible with rural surroundings. This is a further valuable contribution to our overall efforts towards the diversification of farm incomes, and the strengthening of the rural economy generally.

Further opportunities for farm diversification are being explored. My Department is sponsoring considerable research in this area. As I have said, we recently funded a most successful seminar organised by the Centre for Agricultural Strategy, which considered a range of alternatives to existing systems of agricultural production. The results of this seminar are now publicly available.

My hon. Friend referred to forestry and farm woodlands. These are one of the more promising alternatives. For this reason, late last year we issued for consultation a report by officials on the potential for "Woodland as a Farm Crop". Since then the EC Commission has produced its own consultation paper on forestry measures, and the NFU has issued a policy paper under the heading "Farming Trees". This indicates the strong and still growing interest in the possibilities for the expansion of forestry on farms.

The main problem is that the income that trees produce is not likely to be available until perhaps 50 years or more after planting. The difficulty lies in finding some means of bridging this gap. But at the same time, it may be more cost effective to encourage farm woodlands and timber production than to maintain land in agriculture. This is an issue to which we are giving the closest attention, as we fully recognise the economic and—particularly in the case of broadleaves—the environmental benefits that can flow from an increase in farm woodlands.

Agriculture, of course, forms a key part of the rural economy, and its continued strength is therefore of great importance in this respect. But additional support for rural communities generally is provided through the Development Commission, for which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has responsibility. The work of the Commission has assumed even greater significance at a time of uncertainty for agriculture, when new job opportunities are now needed more than ever.

The Development Commission has a wide range of activities, ranging from small factory and workshop construction to provision of grants for the conversion of redundant buildings. It also offers a range of advice, training and assistance to small firms. This activity is backed up by a range of social policies to promote self-help through community and voluntary work.

Some rural areas have a greater concentration and range of problems than others, and that is why nearly 80 per cent. of the Commission's resources are directed to the rural development areas which were designated in 1984. Over the past year, the Commission has launched a co-ordinated approach towards the problems in these areas in close consultation with local agencies. In recognition of this valuable work—I hope that my hon. Friend will be reassured of this additional work which makes a contribution to the rural economy—the funds available to the Development Commission have been substantially increased over the past two years from £21 million to £29 million.

Of course, our policy for agriculture and the rural economy generally must take account of the need to conserve the countryside. It is vital to care for the countryside, its landscape and its wildlife, not only for the people who live and work there but for the millions of visitors who enjoy the countryside on a pleasant day out or on holiday.

The countryside is what it is because of the activities of generations of farmers. It is a managed countryside in which agriculture plays the leading role. We are therefore committed to striking the right balance between all the diverse interests in rural areas and to gearing our agricultural policies towards the achievement of wider environmental, social and economic goals.

We have already gone a long way down this road. Many of the activities with which agricultural Departments are involved are not solely, or even mainly, concerned with agricultural efficiency. For example, the MAFF and the Countryside Commission are jointly sponsoring an experimental scheme for protecting the traditional landscape of the Broads, and the response from farmers has been very positive. Recently, the capacity of

[Mrs. Fenner]

ADAS officers to offer conservation advice has been greatly expanded and the Ministry has already played a leading role in the development of the highly successful Farming and Wildlife Advisory Group movement.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): In relation to the whole saga that surrounded Halvergate, what has the MAFF and the Department of Environment learnt from this episode?

Mrs. Fenner: I am sure that we have learnt the basics for protecting the traditional landscape of the Broads. If Halvergate is among the designated areas, I have no doubt that that will be as successful as the rest of the Broads scheme.

That is our commitment, and the next step is to write it into legislation. As hon. Members know, the Agriculture Bill includes a clause that will require Agriculture Ministers to endeavour to achieve a reasonable balance between the interests of agriculture, the economic and social interests of rural areas, conservation and public enjoyment of the countryside. As a result, not only will this be our policy—which it has been—but it will be our duty. We recognise that this is no easy task, but we have already gone much of the way to achieving it in practice. That clause in the Bill will bring our existing policy into a new and sharper focus.

We are also taking more specific steps to encourage farmers in the achievement of wider environmental goals. Clause 17 of the current Agriculture Bill will empower Agriculture Ministers to designate areas as environmentally sensitive. Within such areas emphasis will be placed on encouraging farmers to maintain and adopt practices that better protect the needs of the environment. We shall do this by asking farmers to enter into agreements whereby they abide by conditions such as restrictions on the use of fertilisers, stocking limits, number and timing of hay cuts, maintenance of hedges and stone walls and so on. Such conditions inevitably have financial implications, and in recognition of this we intend to make payment to farmers who agree to enter our schemes. I know that this new initiative has received a welcome reception among the farming community, and I believe that it represents a most important positive step towards a wider, more integrated approach to support for our valuable rural areas.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Is my hon. Friend yet able to say when the first batch of these ESAs will be designated? We seem to have been waiting a long time for that announcement.

Mrs. Fenner: I accept my hon. Friend's criticism of the time lag, but this is a first experiment, as it were. We hope to be able to announce very shortly the areas that have been accepted. I cannot define it more closely than that. My hon. Friend will have to be patient for a little while longer.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Will it be this year?

Mrs. Fenner: I said very shortly.

I have at some length set out our commitment to agriculture and the rural economy. I hope that the House will agree that the record shows that the Government retain a positive commitment to agriculture, the rural economy and the environment. But we cannot be complacent. The agricultural environment will continue to change. Indeed, the pace of change seems likely to accelerate in the years ahead. We cannot predict in precise terms what the changes will be, and we know from experience that we cannot predict in detail what measures will be agreed in the European Community as a whole to tackle the continuing problem of agricultural surpluses. The detail is often an important part of that.

It is against that background that we must look at the idea of a White Paper or a similar document. I respect what my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood said about the uncertainty felt in agriculture, but it would help no one if we tried to produce a plan for agriculture that was in danger of being out of date.

I have noted what my hon. Friend said, and I shall also listen to what other hon. Members say during the debate. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister—who regrets that he is unable to be present today because of his duties as President of the EC Council of Agriculture Ministers—will be paying similar particular attention to them. I can assure the House that we shall continue to bear this issue very much in mind as the situation develops.

4.40 pm

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I thank you for calling me so early in this debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should also like to thank the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) for giving us all the opportunity both to discuss this important subject and to bring to the Government's attention the great anxiety felt by all hon. Members who represent rural constituencies. I know that the hon. Gentleman and other Conservative Members are worried about what the future holds for them, because the Government's agricultural policy has had a disastrous effect on every Conservative candidate in by-elections during the past three years, when the results are declared.

A long time ago, or so it seems, the Conservative party liked to portray itself as the champion of rural Britain and claim that it alone understood and was able to interpret the voice of the countryside. Today, as the Conservative Government preside over a declining rural economy and the dismantling of the many services and facilities previously enjoyed, that claim sounds extremely hollow.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): Before the hon. Gentleman starts on the apparent benefits of his policy, may I ask whether he is aware that the alliance party on the Gloucestershire county council has just voted in favour of rating agricultural land? Will he temper his remarks bearing that in mind, and will he let us know whether that is now alliance policy?

Mr. Howells: With respect, I shall come to the rating of agricultural land later in my speech and I shall address myself to the specific point raised by the hon. Gentleman.

Agriculture is going through another period of crisis, and more and more farmers are finding it difficult to make a decent living. Opportunities for new entrants into the industry are becoming fewer. With the decline in farming there follows the disintegration of the supporting industries and the structure that upholds and assists the community. They are gradually whittled away until the community disappears. Some of the blame may well be laid at the door of the common agricultural policy, which has encouraged lakes and mountains of produce that cannot be sold. I have always believed that the Government's insensitive handling of agriculture and unwise panic measures have exacerbated the position unnecessarily and caused an unprecedented loss of morale throughout the industry.

The difficulty started in 1984, when the Government introduced milk quotas in a panic. It is a great pity that farmers and agriculture have never got over that sudden shock.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could throw some light on alliance policy on milk quotas and say whether the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) is no longer the Liberal spokesman on agriculture. Can the hon. Gentleman say whether the Liberal party still has no policy on milk quotas, as that hon. Gentleman said?

Mr. Howells: I am surprised that in 1986 Conservative Members are so keen to know what alliance policies are, but of course are doing well at every by-election and they are getting worried, week in, week out. My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) has apologised for the fact that he is unable to be present today, and I am deputising for him. Milk quotas were introduced in 1984, and the hon. Gentleman will agree that the Government rushed them through in a panic. If my colleagues and I had been in office at that time, we would not have introduced them as the Government did.

Agriculture, which was encouraged to become efficient and produce more food, should now be given much more backing to help it through this difficult period in 1986-87. What alarms me and many of my colleagues is that the Government seem intent on doing exactly the opposite. The industry needs help to diversify, and every farmer needs advice relevant to his or her position, but what are the Government doing? They are cutting the advisory services, undermining the work of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service, reducing its effectiveness, cutting staff and then charging for advice. That is not good policy for agriculture. At this time there should be an entirely different approach and a much more supportive attitude from the Government in the form of more advice and assistance, given free. Agriculture needs a 10-year policy so that farmers know exactly where they are going.

I am also alarmed at the way in which the Government are cutting research related to agriculture. In my constituency the Welsh plant breeding station at Gogerddan near Aberystwyth, which is renowned throughout the world for its work and for the way in which it has promoted and developed crop production, recently received news about its recurrent expenditure for 1987-88. It is estimated that there will be a deficit of about £260,000, which is equivalent to 9 per cent. of the budget. Not only will that mean that several posts will be lost in addition to those already lost in the past year or two, but it will lead to a severe loss of morale and a greatly reduced capacity to carry out what has proved to be vital work for the farming community.

Those involved in agriculture in Wales and elsewhere are horrified at this attack on a greatly respected institution and see the same gradual erosion extending throughout all agricultural research and development organisations in Wales and Britain as a whole. We need a radical change of approach to agriculture to match the changed circumstances. There must be more support for the rural economy, and measures should be introduced to support the family farm, to encourage young farmers, and to provide credit facilities and favourable interest rates through an agricultural or land bank. We should give increased support for development and advisory services and for improved marketing schemes, and, generally, provide a suitable environment for diversification.

That cannot be done overnight, but we need to start now to plan for the next 10 years. Do not let us carry on, as we have been doing, going from one crisis to another, with the Government inventing policies as they go. Farmers are tired of uncertainty and changes of direction. Give them more stability and purpose and, by doing so, save the rural economy from decline.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Sceptical as I am of some of the things that the hon. Gentleman is saying, I believe that both he and I have the interests of the rural economy at heart. Will he develop his theme of a land bank for young farmers to promote the family farm? One of the main problems in the crisis that our farming community has faced in the past few years, particularly since the milk quotas, has been that banks have let young farmers get into tremendous debt, and they have suffered most. The hon. Gentleman seems to be suggesting that we have an institutionalised form of debt creation for the very people whom we are trying to help.

Mr. Howells: Let us put the record right once and for all. It has always been the policy of the Liberal party that we should have a land bank. That is also the policy of the alliance. The bank is not for young people to buy land, but to give them the opportunity to start. The Labour and Conservative parties are now in favour of a land bank, on similar terms to that which we envisaged in the first place.

Over the years, I have said that we are fortunate that we have a capital grants scheme, which has operated well for years. However, our counterparts in Europe also have a cheap credit facility. We do not have that choice. Our friends in Europe are willing for us to pursue a policy if it is the wish of the Government that we should have a capital grant scheme or cheap credit facilities. The door is open for us to accept such a policy, and I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree that that is the way to help young farmers.

The hon. Gentleman should divert his mind to another policy. Many smallholdings are owned by county councils. It is a pity that, because of the shortage of cash, many county councils are having to sell these farms. It is the duty of the Government of the day to give extra financial aid to those county councils to make sure that such smallholdings remain.

I feel strongly on this issue. This Government are the worst since the war for ignoring the urgent needs of agriculture. It needs help, and many farmers need to be saved from financial difficulties and ruin. The most effective industry in Britain has been brought to its knees by unwanted Government policies during the past three years. Many farmers have asked me and others how long Ministers will ignore them. It all started in 1984 with the milk quotas. If the Parliamentary Secretary is to wind up the debate, will she answer this question? Do the Government intend to introduce quota systems for any other commodities during the next few years? I can give the answer. As an election is pending, the Government will not do so.

It has been said that the Government have helped farmers for a long time, but farmers are aware that the grants are slipping away quietly and that instead of having 50 or 60 per cent. they are getting 20 or 30 per cent. That is a great shame. If the Government want to help hill farmers and marginal farmers, they can give extra funding under EEC rules, but the grants have never been paid in full, as they should be. No one in Europe is opposed to such grants. It is only the Government who have kept down grants and the hill compensatory allowances.

I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that many sheep producers have applied for the ewe premium under the sheep regime, but many have been refused. Many have been refused the ewe premium because they have not applied in time. Many farmers in England, Scotland and Wales have been denied the premium because their application was 24 or 48 hours late. Nobody disputes that they are honest people, and for the sake of a few hours they should not be deprived of the money that is theirs by right.

The Minister did not tell us what we should do about marketing surpluses to the Third world and other parts of the world. The Government should have a plan for marketing. They should be able to persuade our counterparts in Europe what should be done with the surpluses. We do not need to penalise successful British agriculture. How many times have the Secretaries of State for Wales or for Scotland, who have full responsibility for agriculture in those countries, been in Brussels in the past three years? They have admitted on the Floor of the House that they have not been there to protect our rights during negotiations. It is time that they went there. They have the full responsibility for looking after their people and are duty bound to go.

Many of us on both sides of the House believe that we are Christians. We are all aware that we, together with the rest of the world, spend $17·5 billion a fortnight on arms. If that $17·5 billion were spent to help those in the Third world, every person would be fed, educated and housed. The Government and hon. Members on both sides of the House should give more thought to those people in other parts of the world who are less fortunate than we are.

The hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland) asked me about land rating. I do not know why so many Conservative Members want to find out whether the alliance is in favour of the rating of agricultural land. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) last year introduced a Bill to rate agricultural land. He was supported by other Conservative and Labour Members. It was I and one of my colleagues who spoke against the hon. Gentleman. With the support of many Conservative Members we destroyed the Bill. It has been our policy that we have no intention to rate agricultural land.

I had thought that the Minister would say something about the radioactive fallout in Wales, north England and parts of Scotland. Many people have asked whether there was any need for such lamb restrictions. Perhaps the Minister will tell us later. I know that the National Farmers Union of England and Scotland, and the Farmers Union of Wales have been in touch with her. What is the hon. Lady's latest information on the radioactive fallout and on the compensation to sheep producers?

My hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) asked about cereal farmers. Two years ago, the dairy farmers went through agony, but now the cereal farmers are in dire trouble, and they are getting worried. They are more worried than the dairy producers, and I hope that the Minister will announce when a statement will be made on the Floor of the House of Commons to ensure that the morale of the cereal growers will not be dented, as was that of the dairy producers. I hope that a prepared statement will be made soon.

The hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) said that it is now reasonable for Governments to give farmers a clearer lead on the direction in which they will be expected to go in future. If the Government will not do it, the alliance will.

Sir Peter Mills (Torridge and Devon, West): I welcome this debate and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) upon his choice. He is a true friend of British agriculture and the rural scene. Unlike others, he speaks from experience, and that is important.

I was amazed by the phrase that was used by the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells). He said that this Government were inventing policies as they went along. That is an extraordinary statement to make when one considers all the debates that take place in Brussels and the policies that are formulated there as well as by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The Government do not invent policies as they go along. It is the Liberal candidates who are inventing policies at they go along, and they vary from constituency to constituency. The hon. Gentleman must check up on what is being said by Liberal candidates. I assure him that they believe in agricultural rating.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Secretary of State for Wales apologised on the Floor of the House—as did the Minister of Agriculture—for misusing words and for saying to the public that we are in favour of agricultural rating? That is wrong, and the hon. Gentleman knows that it is wrong.

Sir Peter Mills: That is not so. The hon. Gentleman ought to go to the constituencies and listen to what the candidates are saying.

Farmers are very concerned about the future. All of them understand the problems involved in dealing with the surpluses, as well as the tremendous cost and the reluctance of taxpayers to pay for the storage of surpluses. The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North kept on about agricultural aid and said that far more should be given than is already being given by his Government, but he said nothing about the cost to the taxpayer and about taxpayers' reluctance to pay for it. However, the Government ought to provide guidance and help to agriculture. The industry does not want to be provided with firm guidelines, but it wants to know what will be required in the future. I hope that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary will take that on board.

Swine fever is causing a great deal of concern in the south-west of England. It poses a very serious threat. I ask Ministers to redouble their efforts to ensure that only non-infected meat is allowed into this country. It is absurd that our pig farmers should be put at risk.

Will my hon Friend also note that there is a staffing problem at Weybridge? Of the 220 samples that were sent to Weybridge by veterinary officers, only 70 had been dealt with after 10 days. Testing must be speeded up so that we can get on top of this problem. The results of tests must be made available quickly. The National Farmers Union is pressing for a ban upon all imports of pigmeat. It says that the Government have the power to impose a ban, but legal proceedings could be taken against this country if a ban were to be imposed upon imports of pigmeat. The NFU has prepared a good brief which I shall send to my hon. Friend. I ask the Government to check up on the legal points. If we were to impose a ban on pigmeat imports, it would be ridiculous if then we had to pay a very heavy fine and compensation. But if such a ban could be imposed, I believe that it should be imposed.

As for the future of a great British agricultural institution, the Milk Marketing Board, for many years the board has provided stability and confidence for milk producers. Consumers have also benefited from the board's activities. They have been assured of constant supplies of milk that is pure and of good quality. We must ensure that the board continues to function. Some would disband it. Europe is not too happy about the Milk Marketing Board, and I must confess that some Conservative Members wish the MMB to be disbanded, but that would be a tragedy for all concerned. The Touche Ross report must be implemented and the Dairy Crest problems must be solved. The MMB has provided a great service to both the consumer and the farmer.

We cannot just say that more and more aid must be given to solve the problem of surpluses. That would produce even more surpluses. Alternative crops are essential. A desperate search must be made for alternative miracle crops. The combination of small changes and new enterprises adds up and must be used. I trust that the Government will provide every encouragement to the various agricultural colleges and research establishments to continue the search for alternative crops.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman asks the Government to continue to provide help for the agricultural colleges. Is he not aware that the Government are slashing the assistance that they give the agricultural colleges and that in Scotland the assistance they provide has been reduced by more than 50 per cent., just at the time when help is most needed for those purposes?

Sir Peter Mills: It is not true to say that the Government have slashed assistance. The Government want value for the money that they give to the agricultural colleges, and that is absolutely right. Instead of research covering a very wide area, the colleges should concentrate upon the kind of research that is needed. The need at the moment is for research into alternative crops.

It is important to warn British agriculture of some of the serious problems that it may face in the future. Agriculture has to deal with many problems caused by nature but there are also political problems. I wonder whether the Opposition's proposal to introduce yet further taxation and a wealth tax and to withdraw from Europe is the way to give confidence and help to British agriculture. I doubt it. It is no use the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) shaking his head. The Opposition's policy is that this country should withdraw from Europe and renegotiate. If the hon. Gentleman wants this country to become the dumping ground for European food surpluses, it will do untold harm to British agriculture and, more than anything else, it will sap its confidence.

I do not intend to say any more about agricultural rating. I do not believe that the alliance will ever get the chance to put its policies into operation. However, we have to take seriously what is being said by the Socialists about these matters. I hope that no more nonsense will be talked about our withdrawal from Europe. Membership of the Community has been of great benefit to British agriculture.

As I read the press and survey the rural scene, I come to the conclusion that there has been far too much gloom and doom in some magazines and newspapers. Of course it is true that profits are down, except in the dairy industry. Again, the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North, who spoke for the alliance, does not know his facts. The costings of the Milk Marketing Board and of the British Oil and Cake Manufacturers show that, under quotas, the margin over costs per cow is the highest that it has ever been. It is more than £700 a cow. It is absolutely ludicrous to talk as the hon. Gentleman has done. It is true that profits are down in agriculture generally, and that borrowing is rising, but there are pluses too. Costs are down, farm inputs are down, productivity measures are increasing and many farmers have learnt how to manage in areas where they never thought of doing so before. Interest rates are down and every 1 per cent. reduction in interest rates means £50 million off the burden on agriculture. Long may they continue to fall.

Prices have been good. I do not know what is happening in the constituency of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North but calf prices and store cattle prices have never been higher, and early lambs are fetching the highest prices ever. Some lambs have been fetching £60 each. It is nonsense to talk about the entire industry being on its knees. The prospects for 1986 seem much better. Agriculture should be praised for the way it is adjusting to the difficult circumstances of tremendous surpluses. Agriculture needs some guidelines, support and confidence from the House. The Conservative Governments offer that.

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): Welsh agriculture contributes nearly 4 per cent. to the Principality's gross national product, which is about twice the amount that agriculture contributes to the United Kingdom's GNP. Compared with the United Kingdom, nearly twice the percentage of the working population in Wales is directly dependent upon the industry for employment. The grassland sector, and with it the dairy sector, is the backbone of our rural economy. In a country that is predominantly hilly or even mountainous, that has a well above average rainfall, and where four fifths of the terrain now has, thankfully, less-favoured status, the dairying enterprise is imperative.

Wales has a relatively small arable sector. Income trends in that sector have, overall, been rather more favourable. Even before the badly rehearsed, badly researched quotas were brought into being, restrictive price awards and levies kept incomes to only modest improvements, and that at a time of a general drive for expansion. But it proved to be impossible to throw a dynamic industry into reverse without widespread damage being inflicted. At the time of that expansion drive, there was an exceptionally high financial commitment with record levels of bank borrowing. Welsh farmers realised that allowing production to increase as demand was falling throughout the Community needed positive steps, but penalising a country such as Wales—and Great Britain is more than 10 per cent. short of self-sufficiency in milk and dairy products — would lead to widespread and severe hardship, and there was a rural outcry of unprecedented proportions. That was at the same time as, across the St. George's channel in Eire, the Government there, fully represented at Brussels, could afford and was given extra quota and general preferential treatment.

It is not unnatural, perhaps it is only to be expected, that the wrath extended to the favoured position of New Zealand imports, and to the continued favoured position of New Zealand dairy imports. Even now, dairy producers in Wales and other parts of the United Kingdom—some struggling successfully; alas, many struggling unsuccessfully—must witness the continued importation and the carrying round the world of 80,000 tonnes a year. That appears to Welsh farmers to be shrouded in irrationality.

The farming unions of Wales are now opposed to the continuation of that level of importation from New Zealand. They have recently been joined by the Milk Marketing Board and the Dairy Trade Federation. In 1973 it was agreed that New Zealand would be doing well if in 10 years' time it received just under 25 per cent. of the United Kingdom market. The real figure is now nearer to 40 per cent. The farmers of Wales are very irate that that high level of New Zealand importation should continue.

Our agriculture must contend with a continuing state of affairs whereby measures that appear to favour our national position when imposed by the Community, are inexplicably held back or are only partially enforced by the Government. Yet other countries are prepared to modify, even to reverse, Community measures which, if implemented nationally in that country, would be socially harmful. Not every country in the European Economic Community is fighting by the Queensberry rules.

When some commodities are produced in excess we take a short-sighted and almost miserly attitude towards research and innovation. There is an abject lack of an overall agenda for the future. The Government appear to prefer to leave things to chance.

Of the United Kingdom farmers that employ labour, 23 per cent. account for 80 per cent. of farming output. Since the second world war, the larger farms have ridden the storms better and, in general, have done better and been more prosperous than the smaller farms. Far too few of the grants, the guaranteed prices and the deficiency payments have percolated through to the farm workers. There is annual indignation from farmers who employ labour when the wages board announces modest annual pay increases. Farm wages urgently need to be brought into line with the wages of other industrial manual workers. That is how agriculture can influence and improve our rural economy.

The farming community still has the largest occupational group claiming family income supplement. That should not be allowed to continue. During the past 15 years the number employed in agriculture has continued to fall sharply and, with persistently high rural unemployment, there has been far too great a tendency to call upon casual and part-time labour. With the loss of farming jobs, the whole non-farming rural economy suffers. Village and hamlet life loses essential facilities and unfortunately, in many of the remoter rural areas there is hardly any infrastructure to which small-scale industries can be attached. Job creation is stagnant.

Well before the end of the century, Britain will have a new commodity surplus. There will be a surplus of rural land. An area equivalent to the size of Wales or East Anglia will be surplus to agricultural needs. Years of heavy investment and improving efficiency will have by then taken their toll. Many hon. Members have mentioned the mounting surpluses and they are a continuing embarrassment, with millions of pounds of national taxation being used to pay farmers for crops for which there is either no market or a diminishing market. Those which are not used have to be stored at equally escalating and prohibitive costs. We have had dairy produce surpluses, and now cereals are being vastly over-produced. Farmers who were induced or forced to give up milk production, turned to beef and sheep, and it is likely that within a few years those commodities will be yet further examples of surpluses.

Much innovation and enterprise has been focused upon the alternative use of surplus land. It appears that the land must be used, come what may. The solution may lie in further afforestation, and there would appear to be a social as well as an economic advantage, because timber imports would be reduced and local jobs would be provided, thus countering the depopulation that follows land becoming surplus to conventional usage. We must support areas of localised afforestation. It is hoped that such afforestations may include the lowlands, the broad-leaf woodlands and farm forestry, as opposed to landowner and specialised companies. The needs of the former must be subsidised.

The contribution that forestry can make as a fuel as well as a chemical resource should not be forgotten, and could form part of a sensible non-nuclear strategy. We hope that that is what will finally emerge. The redundancy of agricultural land is not a limited farming interest. Such a situation might be immensely challenging. Both the countryside, and jobs in the countryside, could be protected, as many aspects of rural life could be thrown open to the people as never before.

At a more parochial level, farmers, and particularly hillfarmers, need to be reassured following the ban on sheep, their movement and slaughtering. There must be adequate and honourable compensation. Last summer's poor weather and cash flow problems form the background to the recent disasters afflicting the farmers on the hillsides of Wales. Others, too, must not be forgotten, such as those who work in abattoirs and those who are employed in the haulage industry.

Farmers must ensure that they keep accurate records of costs and losses associated with those restrictions. They must be prepared to present adequate, substantiated proof of their damaging effects. We must not leave our farming community or our hillside farmers high and dry on that issue.

We are passing into an era in which a highly sophisticated food-buying public is developing. There is a general and developing interest in organic farming. The public is becoming aware of the dangers of, for example, the irradiation of food, the contamination of food by agrochemicals, and the indiscriminate use of pesticides, many of which have been banned in other countries and in other EEC countries as well.

We are moving in the right direction. As a result, some sectors of the conventional agricultural community will be adversely affected. Hence the need for a rolling programme, and for a comprehensive forward review of agriculture. The Government are reticent and reluctant to bring that forward, but, unless they do so, displeasure with them will continue. Indeed, that has already been witnessed in by-elections during the past two summers. Unless the Government do something about agriculture, and particularly grassland agriculture, they will suffer even more electorally.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): To be on the safe side I should declare an interest in this subject, as I am a working farmer.

In the time scale of farming and food production, the current crisis of surpluses has hit farmers in this country very quickly. Only three and a half years ago they were being urged to produce more and more food at home. Many geared up to do that, often with borrowed money. In this debate, it is important to recall much of the cause of today's dilemma in the countryside.

Farmers and the ancillary trades face the future with apprehension and uncertainty. They are inevitably looking more and more to the Ministry, not to tell them precisely what to do, but to lay down some rough guidelines for the future. A rigid and unswerving devotion to price cutting will claim many victims in the countryside on the way, and at the end of the day it will solve nothing and will serve only to accelerate the exodus from the land and to destroy rural communities.

Currently, 80 per cent. of the EEC budget is spent on buying, storing and disposing of surpluses. Agricultural support in the United Kingdom now costs the taxpayer twice as much as the total net income of farmers. As prices fall, farmers seek to produce more and more. We are all being urged on by the ancillary industries, which are also feeling the pinch. As a farmer, I have never had so much literature through the post before from various ancillary trades suggesting how I can increase the output of my farm.

The present policy of trying to control over-production can be described only as crisis management. It concentrates minds on only one product at a time. The aim is to smooth out a bulge here, which inevitably produces a bulge there. As has been said, sheep farmers used to ask us to urge the Ministry not to reduce the price of cereals too far, for fear that the prosperous arable farmers of East Anglia would all go into sheep production, leading to a crisis in sheep production. They therefore understandably ask what they can invest in with any certainty.

In fairness, I should perhaps have asked this question six months ago, but I wonder whether there is a forecast or model at the Ministry or anywhere else giving the long-term effects of continuing to cut the price of cereals and of buying in beef. Production restraint through co-responsibility levies—which is what we have—has been tried in the past and has failed. Does any hon. Member imagine that price restraint will encourage farmers to produce less? With a 43 per cent. drop in incomes in the past year, farmers of all sizes are fighting back as best they can by producing more and more. They are all doing it to the very best of their ability. Sadly, some of them will fail. I believe that they will be mainly those on poorer land, and on the western side of the country.

Many hon. Members have probably read about the plight of Mr. Stewart Thomas, which was mentioned on the front page of this week's Farming News, but many others will follow him if we continue with a policy of price restraint. Price restraint will inevitably lead to more intensification in the eastern counties. Conservation will suffer, as farmers struggle to stay in business. The EEC budget will continue to demand more and more finance to purchase, store and dispose of surplus production. At the end of the day, none of us will be better off. It is a pretty depressing picture.

Nevertheless, as has been said, farmers are great entrepreneurs and are looking everywhere for new crops. Many of them are trying new crops on a small scale, but the only real alternatives to cereals, for those who are tooled up to cope with them, are oilseed rape, beans and peas. Other farmers have tried different crops, such as flax, linseed, evening primrose, domestically produced snails for home consumption, and even—as I heard the other day—ducks' feet for export to China, but those can only be described as exotics and at best may make only a modest contribution to farmers' incomes. The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) has tried growing evening primrose and has warned me of it, saying that there is no money in the job.

Forestry has already been talked of as an alternative. It will take root only on the poorer land to the west of the country—for example, in some parts of the Forest of Dean, and in the Cotswolds, where my farm is located. Those areas already have sufficient trees. Farmers in East Anglia, who have highly productive land, should be encouraged to plant more trees, which we need for many purposes, yet they show no interest whatsoever in doing so.

Another suggestion is set-aside. A proposal to leave land barren will not find much sympathy with today's ramblers and the other urban visitors who seek to make the countryside agreeable to themselves. Farmers will not favour such a suggestion. I should not like to set my farm aside and see it taken over by thistles and weeds.

Other farmers are trying to cash in on leisure, with holiday cottages, shooting, fishing and caravans. I am trying to grow a crop of caravans, but am severely restricted by the local planning authorities, which have other ideas.

The answer for the farmers, and also for the taxpayer, is to extend the system of quotas to all products currently in surplus. That would be the quickest and the surest method of control. It would allow each farmer to tailor his production to suit his own farming practice, just has been done in the dairy sector.

Quotas will not encourage inefficient production, as is often said, because each farmer will want to maximise his return. As a result of quotas, land will become available for alternative production and more attention will be paid to producing products which are in deficit; for example, flax, evening primrose, and ducks' feet for export to China. More new markets will be explored by farmers, who will operate from a base of strength and confidence, rather than having continually to look over their shoulders and wonder whether the new enterprise in which they have invested will be the next to have the price of its end product cut by EEC Ministers.

Another advantage is that all the land will be cared for and farmed. I genuinely believe that the farmers of this country have been in conservation for a lot longer than have most of the Greens. People will be retained on the land in the smaller family units mentioned by some hon. Members, rather than holdings becoming larger, with management and directors operating at arm's length from the land and sitting in offices many miles away from the farm. We have already seen this starting in the United Kingdom, and I do not want to see it encouraged.

A system of quotas would maintain agricultural incomes, albeit at a lower level and at much less cost to the taxpayer than in previous years. Last year there was a 43 per cent. drop in incomes. As we saw last week, maintaining agricultural incomes is one of the main objects of the common agricultural policy. Quotas will give farmers confidence and provide better opportunities for young people to assess a farm's real worth before tendering a rent or entering any other form of farming enterprise. At the end of the day, quotas will save the EEC budget literally millions of pounds.

Some will say that quotas would be impossible to operate and police. However, can that be true in this age of the computer, satellite photographs and the Land Registry? Others will ask how we can get the French, the Germans and the Italians to co-operate. Why could national quotas for guaranteed Community buying not be set, based on past performance, and each national Government left to sort out their own surpluses, and to do what they will with their own taxpayers?

National quotas should be based on acreage rather than on tonnage produced. Quotas should apply to everybody. It is not true to say that because a farmer feeds home-produced foodstuffs on his farm he is necessarily more sociable or desirable than a cereal farmer, such as myself, who produces only cereals.

A quota approach to surpluses is not a piecemeal approach, such as has caused problems in the past and will cause more problems in the future. The present policy of forcing down cereal prices may appear a boon for livestock feeders in the short term, but in the medium term it will produce an explosion in intensively produced pigs and poultry. This will further undermine the price of beef and lamb and put more pressure on EEC funds.

West Gloucestershire is a rural constituency. I have experienced at first hand much of the excellent work that is going on there and elsewhere, as the Minister mentioned, to develop rural businesses and to keep rural communities alive. Agriculture is the engine of the rural economy and we must seek to keep it in balance, in the long-term interests not only of the farmers and those who live in the countryside, but of all the taxpayers of this country.

5.35 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) will acquit me of discourtesy if I do not congratulate him on winning this ballot. By rights, the motion should have been that standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell). It is a matter of supreme irony that, as I understand it, the application was put in not by the hon. Member for Sherwood, but by the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Mr. Stanley), who should have been answering the debate on 6 June, the loss of which made it possible to have this extra time for private Members' business.

However, the hon. Member for Sherwood has chosen well because this is an important subject. I am, therefore, in no way curmudgeonly about his choice of subject, and should like to raise specific issues with the Minister.

My first point relates to the ongoing saga of the destruction, for that is the right word, of the Macaulay research institute at Aberdeen, which I visited with some of my hon. Friends. I would pray in aid, not any Opposition Members, but the former Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who is now the Minister of State, Department of Energy, who has close links with the Macaulay institute, and who is continuing the fight inside the Government.

Hon. Members who have visited the institute are absolutely appalled at what is happening to the concentration of agricultural research in the Aberdeen area. I can say this the more strongly because, although I am a Scottish Member, I have no constituents nearby. However, the Macaulay and the Rowett combine to make a major European centre for agricultural research, and that is being destroyed. I ask the Government what they intend to do about it, not least because of the representations which I understand have been made by the Minister of State, Department of Energy, who is a local Member of Parliament. I am dismayed at the cuts that have taken place at Rothamsted relating to soil research. I do not know how the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food could comment on the health of agricultural research in the United Kingdom at present. Her remarks do not correspond with the facts.

Secondly, the Parliamentary Secretary referred to grants to ancillary industries. How much money was she talking about? It may be justified, but I wonder whether grants to ancillary industry are as worth while as the money that is being taken from agricultural research. The Government should at least justify their policy.

My third point is relevant to my constituency, but it is even more important to Clydeside and to other areas of the country. I am not alone in believing that glasshouse owners are no longer crying wolf. Meeting their fuel expenditure is a very real problem. The hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) knows the problems at first hand.

What is being done in all the discussions with the EC about what can properly be described as unfair competition from Holland? The Europeans go on and on subsidising their glasshouse owners, particularly their tomato producers, and ours get very little. Many are being driven out of business. Glasshouse owners tell me that they cannot do the repairs and maintenance that are necessary if they are to continue in business.

My fourth point is a bit different. I interrupted the Minister when she talked about what was being done in particular conservation areas. I shall not go into the details of Halvergate that so exercised the Committee considering the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill other than to say that it seems to some of us that marshland is being drained, moorland is being cut back and the surpluses are getting ever bigger. Does that form any kind of a rational approach?

I repeat the question that I put in the intervention. What has been learned since Halvergate? If I am told that the Government will never do any such thing again and that grants are being withdrawn for the drainage of ecologically valuable marshes, so be it, but that is not the information that comes to us.

I remain with the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill, on which some of us spent 100 hours in Committee, and return to the old question of the Sandford amendment and the Sandford money. I see the hon. Member for Dumfries smiling. He was the competent Minister who dealt with all this. In Committee some of us said that we wanted to monitor, year by year, how much Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food money is going into conservation. We have been told hitherto that it is difficult to identify it. Forgive me for being cynical, but I suspect that very little of MAFF funds is going into identifiable conservation causes. If the Government think that we are wrong, let us be told when the Minister replies.

My penultimate question is about marine nature reserves. I understand the difficulties about Lundy. However, other areas were designated. Why are we taking so long? If Ministers accepted the reasons for marine nature reserves five years ago, why are we dealing with the circumlocution office in getting things done—I will not say on the ground, because that would not be an appropriate analogy? Those of us who five years ago argued the case, and rightly, are greatly disappointed.

I understand that the Salmon Bill will not now be taken in the last week before the recess but in the week that we come back in October. If the Government have plans to do it next week, fair enough. However, those of us who spent a long time discussing it in Committee—I am not just talking about my hon. Friends but about a number of Conservative Members as well, particularly the hon. Members for Crawley (Mr. Soames) and for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson-Smith)—put forward strong arguments, the better briefed we became, that something should be done about the drift netting position.

If that Bill is to remain until the hang-over of the Session, I ask the Government, for heaven's sake, to pay some heed to what was said in that Committee and reflect on whether the weight of argument suggests changes in the Bill. No one on that Committee will come and poke a finger and say, "We told you so," or make any political capital. It is not that kind of a Bill. Surely the purpose of House of Commons Committees is that there should be time for reflection. The Government may not have got it right, but that is not entirely the fault of present Ministers. The Bill goes back to the noble Lord Mansfield and the briefing that he received a long time ago. The fact is that basically much of the Bill is flawed and fundamentally wrong. If it is to be taken in the autumn, there is some time to do something about it.

Finally, I had the honour of attending the annual conference of the National Federation of Site Operators this year. It invites politicians of different parties. Have the representations that Mr. Spencer and his colleagues have been making to MAFF on the difficulties of site and location policy and rating been accepted and what does MAFF think should be done to help the site operators who, after all, are an important part of the rural economy and British industry?

Mr. Jack Aspinwall (Wansdyke): First, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) for creating this opportunity to outline some of the unease and uncertainty expressed by many farming communities about the future of the rural economy.

Agriculture, as has been illustrated this afternoon, is in a state of flux. The development of technology in areas of specialisation and modernisation, and the requirements of the CAP, all herald change for rural society and industry. The increase in farm costs of some 22 per cent.—more than farmgate prices over the past seven years—is also worrying. It has been estimated that to bring supply in line with demand, 14 per cent. of land now devoted to agriculture will have to be put to some other use, and, in the next decade, 10 per cent. of our agricultural land could be looking for alternative uses.

That readjustment threatens the very existence of the rural community and the village idyll. Agriculture is crucial to the rural economy. For every job in farming, which now employs about 620,000 people directly, four or five jobs exist in industries connected with it. A lack of jobs discourages young people from staying in villages and their places are taken by people retiring to the countryside and by second-homers.

Rural Britain should not be a dormitory area which does not contribute to the well-being of the nation as a whole. Those areas should be full of appropriate vigour and activity, and, in a country which is in reality a crowded island, it is illogical not to use the potential that this valuable asset represents.

Changes are taking place in the way that we view the countryside and the agricultural community is changing too. In this, the Government must play their part in grasping the nettle and giving a clear commitment and guidance for the future of agriculture and the rural economy, assisting the farming community to be successful and moving towards exploiting the enormous potential in growing and providing food of greater variety.

There are three broad areas in which positive measures can be taken. I am heartened to see that certain steps are already afoot. Initially, there is room for development in marketing. The era of guaranteed high prices for unlimited agricultural produce is disappearing, the free market environment is becoming more a fact of life. The British farmer is responding to that demand and in so doing ensures top quality produce for the discerning consumer, properly graded and packaged.

It is on the demand side that action can be taken. Some of us are familiar with the Agricultural Marketing Act 1983 which established Food from Britain, a central co-ordinating agency to promote and improve the marketing of British agricultural produce. I have been heartened by the fact that the Government saw fit to provide £14 million initial funding during is first five years. I hope that that important organisation will continue to receive Government encouragement. The quality of products has now been given a degree of assurance under the British food quality mark scheme. That is soon to be extended and will, I hope, eventually cover most of the essential British foods to aid the discerning housewife.

Locally grown food must be promoted. There is considerable scope for marketing co-operatives — a recent example being the "Taste of Somerset" group which was set up three years ago, covering South Avon in which my constituency lies. It returned in triumph from the Royal Show this year with valuable orders for the future. With the farming community continuing to take the initiative, supported by the Government, I am sure that marketing will make a fundamental contribution to ensuring that a healthy rural environment is maintained.

Secondly, new ideas for crops should be looked at more positively, not merely shrugged off as irrelevant. Farms can become more varied, interesting and accessible, thereby finding new ways to earn money. Enterprising farmers have found ingenious ways to meet the challenge. In the west country there have been many reports of such entrepreneurial activities. One farmer has recently planted new cider orchards, because of the demand for cider and the huge demand from health food shops for English apple juice. On hearing the news that a great deal of apple juice was imported from France, I wondered why. Another farmer has begun specialising in worm farming. The worms turn muck into high quality compost and are themselves turned into protein feed additives.

There are many markets to be exploited. We spend about £30 million per annum on imported herbs. That must be a market to go for. We can grow all those herbs and there is a need for co-operatives and marketing co-ordination to take advantage of the opportunity.

There is also a growing demand for fresh, organically grown vegetables and health products. One notable farmer is selling sheep's milk cheese to Harrods and another has just doubled his organic vegetable business because the market is crying out for more produce, particularly mushrooms and other vegetables.

Another entrepreneur has decided to take on the French by going into snail farming, and British and English wines are beginning to take off in the world of the grape. The traditional Somerset crop of teazles is also taking on new life. The dried teazle head brings up the nap on high quality cloth, the demand for which is growing because of the current snooker boom.

Another opportunity exists in farm forestry. Our import bill is over £4 billion per annum and we import more than 80 per cent. of the timber that we use. With land being available, opportunities to develop forestry as a general farm enterprise must be encouraged. Such a long-term activity must receive realistic and continuing income support. There could be many more job opportunities in timber processing, too. The environmental impact on our landscape would be appreciable.

Those are just a handful of ideas. There are many more and a great deal is being done. The signs are that, with proper guidance and encouragement, British agriculture is taking on the future and adapting to a changing scenario, as it has always done.

The third area where positive steps can be taken is the encouragement of alternative strategies in the countryside. I stress that I do not advocate the permanent loss of our countryside to the property developer, but we must not let rural planning policy stand in the way of small-scale housing projects, the development of light cottage industries and the conversion of farm buildings. That point was adequately made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government, at the 40th Oxford farming conference earlier this year.

As early as 1984 the Development Commission urged the conversion of farm buildings and proclaimed the idea a "splendid success", asserting:

"conversions fulfil . . . the aim to make the countryside a place where local people can live and work, bringing back economic vitality to villages and small towns — and thus helping to keep open the local village shop and school."

In the west country such conversions have included local craft and furniture workshops and small food processing centres for locally made jams, cider, wines and real dairy ice cream. However, there are still too many local authorities that do not recognise that an unobtrusive rural conversion from a disused farm building to workshops, manufacturing units or recreational facilities will make a contribution to the local economy, providing jobs and enabling other functions to be done better, because more resources are available.

The growth of tourism and leisure activities also must be supported. A number of farmers and land owners have proved themselves to be most enterprising. One farmer who has converted some of his land into a lake lets out rights to trout fishermen, selling the supply to the market and providing a recreational amenity. There have also been conversions to golf courses, ski slopes and many other appropriate uses.

Other suggestions have involved the development of farm holidays and tourism and the opening of farms to the public. All those ideas have one feature in common — the aim of keeping the countryside active and vital. I trust that the Government will continue to give their support and encouragement to that aim.

The farming community has to face many problems. The recent hippy invasion cost farmers in my constituency many thousands of pounds. There have been high legal bills, including costs of £1,544 and £750 in legal charges alone. That is an enormous burden added to the damage costs, which I believe that the Government should cover on behalf of the general community. I shall be pleased to hear the views of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary when she replies.

Many other frustrations are suffered by enterprising country people, including red tape, especially in planning. I am sure that the saga of the simple bed and breakfast sign, with the frustration of endless paperwork, delays and confusion, is not an unfamiliar experience.

It seems that inflexibility about the prospects for change needs a thorough review. With the farming and rural communities taking the lead, supported by the Government encouraging and supporting marketing initiatives, new ideas for new crops and strategies, and perhaps even a differential rating system for some of the rural facilities and services such as small shops and the important village post offices, I am sure that agriculture and the rural economy can face the future with greater hope.

I received a letter recently from the secretary of the south-west branch of the Women's Farming Union and I think that the House would be interested to hear the heart of the letter. Mrs. Norah Pow wrote:

"Our brief, in the past few decades, has been to put food in the shops, in plentiful supply, at prices the consumer can afford. By our skill and use of grants from government we have fulfilled that order.

By telling us at a stroke to cease production as we have come to understand it, we shall denude the countryside of its traditional inhabitants, and fill it with trendy, commuter-type people, who have no real understanding of the countryside. To keep our nation strong, we must keep a strong presence of food producers in the countryside, give them a sensible price for producing less food, but make sure the people of the nation are warned that we shall keep those people there only if we are prepared to eat what they produce.

Coupled with this, we must tell the people that trendy, imported lentils, muesli etc., is not the answer to good health. Take a look at diet in this country 50 years ago. Both milk and meat formed a good proportion of our daily diet. Above all, let the government get its facts right concerning diet. Milk is an important health food, and contains ONLY 3·8 per cent. fat. If they must attack bad diets, take a look at the fried chip, and sweet biscuit industry, at chocolate and . . . fizzy drinks, etc. — or are they afraid of the response of those manufacturers and marketers?

Farmers have been asked to produce meat with less fat, and have responded admirably to this request. Yet persistently we hear through media and papers that eating meat is bad for people. A sensible amount of meat is vital for a balanced diet, and stories to the contrary lead once more to loss of livelihood for livestock producers at the same time robbing third world countries of their own produced food, vital to their own peoples . . . Turning defunct farm buildings into rural workshops for the production of stained glass, pottery, and furniture will only slightly correct the loss of livelihood in villages. The answer should be to let agriculturalists continue to feed our own people, but let us get into the schools and hospitals, and tell them to feed people on locally produced, fresh, healthy food . . . Rice may be good for Indians, but jacket potatoes grown locally are the answer to both our rural, health, employment, and balance of payment problems."

The farming industry has a history of responsibility and an ability to respond well to change. The signals at the moment point to diversification, the mobilisation of entire farm resources, a more varied use of land and buildings and improvements in marketing. I feel confident that, with the Government's help, the British farmer and the rural community, will take on the challenge and win — preserving the rural environment, improving opportunities for employment, ensuring that the rural economy is sound, producing good British food at reasonable prices and making a vital contribution to the nation's quality of life.

Sir Paul Hawkins (Norfolk, South-West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) on his good fortune in the ballot and on the way in which he moved his motion.

Unfortunately, I cannot declare an interest. I should have liked to be a farmer many years ago and would like to be one now, but I was never allowed to be a farmer, because I was told that I did not have enough brains and my father did not have enough money.

I wish to say a few words to some of my hon. Friends who seem always to denigrate East Anglia. I was told by my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland) — I think that Gloucestershire is the second best county in England—that we in East Anglia had no woodlands, but I think that Thetford forest in my constituency is the largest forest in England.

Many farms in East Anglia could do well with more woodlands. If more of our better lands—not the best—were put to woodland or forestry we would create a variation in the countryside and improve windswept areas with few hedges. Most places did not have hedges for many thousands of years. Part of Norfolk had no hedges because it was a sheep walk. Hedges were introduced in the 17th and 18th centuries. Now, most of the hedges have had to go.

Some people seem to think that too many trees in East Anglia have been cut down and that the area is inhospitable to those who want to walk and ramble in the countryside. East Anglia is an arable county. Apart from the woodlands at Thetford, crops of sugar beet and wheat are produced, and they cannot stand large numbers of people tramping through them.

Town-based organisations are rightly interested in the countryside, but ' ·st impress upon them that unless farming is reason..ly prosperous the countryside will suffer. Farmers and farm workers might leave the land, leaving possibly the most scenic areas as deserts, to which no one will want to come from the towns or from other countries.

Town-based organisations often criticise farmers, but if they constantly attack farmers they are unlikely to gain their co-operation. Most farmers who live on their farms and whose families have worked their farms for generations are the best carers of the countryside. Their care has made our countryside what it is today — a wonderful and beautiful part of the world to visit for holidays and recreation.

I spent a week in Turkey. I could not have been received more hospitably. When I came back, even though in one weekend I had to attend five fetes within five miles and it poured with rain, I thought that green England was one of the loveliest countries in the world.

The main problem over the last few years has not been production. The greatest problem for farmers, particularly those who have entered farming during the last 20 years, has been over-borrowing. Each time the price of land goes up farmers tend to borrow against the increased value of the land, but when the land goes down in value farmers experience difficult times. When the value of land decreases and rents come down — as come down they must — younger farmers will have the opportunity to enter the industry once again. The Government must do all that they can to help.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood mentioned sugar beet. It is probably Norfolk's most useful crop. It provides employment in the factories, in the haulage industry and, although not as much as in the past, on the farms. Sugar beet puts more money into the rural economy—into the shops and villages—than any other crop. We are all extremely worried about the British sugar beet crop. I urge the Minister to try to speed up the inquiry to clear up the doubt and worry.

I do not care a damn who runs the British sugar industry, although I am in favour of a certain company which has pulled round other industries. I do not care a damn, so long as the sugar beet industry is looked after, and so long as whoever is in charge stands up for it against the machinations in Brussels. I do not want a monopoly in Europe. We must guard against that. British sugar must remain an important industry. I hope that the Minister realises how important it is, not only as a change crop in East Anglia with barley and wheat, but as a crop which creates employment and money for the countryside.

As I tried to say in my intervention, it is essential that research is concentrated on what worries farmers today. What further help can be given? Will research take into account the pros and cons of putting woodland on to farms, the pros and cons of the industrial use of farm crops and the pros and cons of any other farm crops that might be grown in Great Britain?

In the past 20 years the population of Norfolk has grown faster than that even of the south coast. East Anglia produces all forms of food for our own people. We must not dilute the area because it is of great benefit to townspeople who want to visit the countryside and the coast.

Because blight has hit so many of our industrial cities, many people want to return to the countryside. I hope that those cities will be made better so that people are content to retire to them, and to holiday in Norfolk. I do not want every village in Norfolk to become a settlement for retired townspeople. If that happens, an antipathy will grow among those retired people who think that the countryside is heaven but do not realise the realities. Food is just as expensive in the countryside as it is in the towns. There is no doubt about that.

We want Norfolk to remain an area which produces food but to which people will be pleased to come. We want people to visit our seaside, the countryside and the woodlands of Thetford. We want Norfolk to be a holiday place.

Once again I plead with the Minister to give us some ideas about which way we are going. We cannot have detailed plans. We know that most farming plans are made in Brussels, but the Minister must be able to say to British farmers, "This is the way we hope we will go. This is the way in which we will help farmers to go, subject to what happens in Brussels, and we shall try to persuade Brussels that this is the way we want Europe and Great Britain to go in the future."

6.10 pm

Mr. John Corrie (Cunningham, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) on securing this debate today. I should declare an interest in that I am a practical farmer. How long that continues depends on how right my hon. Friend the Minister gets the policy over the next few years. There is no doubt that we are discussing this at a dramatic time for rural areas. I do not need to talk about the glut of food or the huge bank indebtedness because the Minister knows that very well. However, there has been a change in the past four or five years. Before that time all sectors could buy themselves out of a problem by simply producing more food on their farms to pay for their extra costs. Now, of course, all sectors where we have quotas, such as the dairy industry, can no longer do that and, as the costs increase, the lid is on the income of the farm and the pressure is on.

I, like my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland), sincerely hope that the Government are looking at quotas for all products in the future because as the pressure increases for one product with quotas such as milk at the moment, people will simply jump from that to other sectors within the industry, such as beef and lamb. The sooner we bite the bullet the better.

We have to take about 2·5 million hectares out of production in this country. That does not necessarily mean that it goes out of production completely. There are ways of taking it out by going for extensive farming rather than intensive farming. The real answer to our problem is that the common agricultural policy has been too efficient. Many people say that we were wrong to encourage production as we have done. I would not agree with that. I hope that the Minister will agree that if we are to have quotas throughout Europe we have to reach the high figures in all products so that as a nation we start well up the league when that time comes.

I believe that we are going through what we might call the third industrial revolution. In the 1930s and 1940s we saw the move from horses to tractors. In the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s we saw a tremendous move forward in fertilisers, chemical sprays and modernisation of equipment. We have now reached the crunch time, when we have to cut back. I was pleased to hear my hon. Friend the Minister saying that the cutback would have to take place throughout Europe because there is no way in which farmers in this country will have their highly efficient industry cut just to please other nations throughout Europe.

As many people have said during the debate, it is not only the farmer who is affected when agriculture hits bad times. It is the machinery companies, the seed merchants and the fertiliser companies, which are now waiting on their money. The local blacksmith, the local post office, the local school and the local bus service are all parts of a rural economy. Empty farm cottages, which are lived in for only two months of the year because they have become second homes, reduce the rural economy.

It is no use simply looking at the agriculture industry in isolation. It is now a rural problem. Country life needs a viable agricultural industry to sustain its families or they drift to the towns and urban areas and cause problems there. It is no use tinkering with the system any longer. I believe that some drastic changes are needed and I am sure that the Minister is wondering why I do not suggest something.

I suggest that it is no use any longer having production subsidies when we have mountains of food and lakes of wine and milk. Therefore, those production subsidies should be changed in some way. I suggest that we should move from a headage payment to a hectarage payment. If we are to diversify into different sorts of industry within our agricultural industry or if we are to move to forestry on a small or large scale, we shall need some sort of social payment to farmers as the changeover takes place. Getting a hectarage payment would take the pressure off producing too much beef or lamb. In that way we may be able to hold on to the viability of our agricultural industry.

The problem is not the fact that we do not have enough money poured into the industry. Billions of pounds are poured in from Europe each year. The problem is the way in which the money is being spent. In fact, if we got rid of our surpluses now agriculture, would have billions of pounds to spend in a way that would certainly keep it going.

There is a second thing to be done which has already been mentioned. We should move away from grants of any kind and towards an agricultural bank with low interest rates. The Government would have only to pick up the bill between the low interest rate and the standard rate of interest. Of course, the lower the Government could keep the rate of interest, the better it would be. That would mean that we would not have people borrowing money to top up the grants that they get to put up buildings that they do not need, to grow a crop that probably nobody wants anyway. We have to find some way of keeping the industry viable and, at the same time, keeping a rural economy going.

The only answer to over-production is not to produce goods in the first place. The more one produces the more it costs to save the produce. We are simply wasting billions of pounds in storage costs. It would save us that vast amount of money if we dumped the entire lot in the sea. However, that is not morally acceptable. Of course we shall see a move to forestry but I believe that it will not be on a small scale because it will be extremely difficult to integrate that on smaller farms. However, there are vast areas throughout Scotland, England and Wales where woodland could be planted. As timber is one of our biggest imports, that would be no bad idea.

Leisure and recreation will play a much bigger part in the future because we have many people unemployed and, if we face hard facts, that will continue. Properly planned and integrated into the countryside, leisure and recreation can do the rural areas no harm whatsoever. I suggest that we have to look at relaxation of some of our planning laws. I could have 100 new families building houses on one of my islands off the west coast of Scotland which would regenerate that island. However, because of planning restrictions, only four houses are allowed to be built. We want conservation but we want it in a sensible manner, not on a blanket scale which sterilises huge areas of the countryside.

I said at the start that we are facing dramatic changes. We must sort out the future. It is no use just burying our heads in the sand and saying that we have to wait until the EC sorts it out. It is time that we as a Government showed a lead in this matter. We must sit down with the National Farmers Union, landowners, Government bodies and conservationists because it is our rural economy that depends on the outcome. Any delay will only pile up the problems more and more. I hope that the Government have taken on board how difficult the situation is just now and how much more difficult it will become if we delay any longer.

Mrs. Elizabeth Shields (Ryedale): This debate is one of considerable interest to my constituents in Ryedale, as about 20 per cent. of the community are involved in farming or in the many allied industries that are the backbone of our small market towns.

More individuals would like to be involved in agriculture. Although the proportion of the rural population working on the land has fallen dramatically since the war through increased use of advanced machinery, there still exists a strong desire among those who have grown up in the country to seek a living from the land. One has perhaps to live in a hamlet or village oneself fully to appreciate the kind of love that people have for the land. Sadly, the kind of small farm or smallholding that would provide an entrance to such a living is difficult to come by in Ryedale, and no doubt that is true elsewhere too.

A few years ago North Yorkshire county council sold off many of its smallholdings, which became part of the larger estates, thus effectively preventing new and young entrants from gaining access to agriculture. In seeking to revitalise the role of the rural economy, we should look for ways to encourage the young to return to the land. Local authorities generally should stop selling off the smallholdings, and perhaps should increase the stock of land that is available for prospective smallholders. Authorities should be discouraged from pursuing an amalgamation policy unless that is essential.

I reiterate the statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) about the need for an agriculture land bank. Such a bank would provide long-term, low-interest credit to enable small and new entrants to farming to stock and modernise their units. It would not be intended to provide finance for the purchase of land.

Farming cannot be changed overnight, as it needs long-term policies. That is something that the farmers among whom I live have told me repeatedly during the many years that I have lived in Ryedale, and not only recently. If they are to grow and prosper, they do not need policies that are made on one day and changed by a Minister on the following day, such as we had with milk quotas years ago.

Whatever emerges from the debate, I hope that policies will be forward looking and that we shall have a five to 10-year planning policy for agriculture.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): I am delighted to have the opportunity of contributing briefly to the debate on agriculture and the rural economy. A large part of my constituency is agricultural and Ipswich, of which I represent a quarter, is much dependent on successful agriculture. I should like to rephrase the title of the debate, for I believe that agriculture is the rural economy. It is the mainspring that drives everything else along. If it slows, it has an effect on all the ancillary industries in rural towns and villages. That is an effect that can quickly be seen, and it is starting to be seen already.

I wish to raise only three issues. First, I want the House and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to reaffirm their faith in farming. I am sure that my hon. Friend will do so. Secondly, I believe that we need an urgent commitment on the part of the Government to help to find ways of maintaining the dynamism of agriculture. Thirdly, I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to do all that she can to ensure that, however complicated the framework may become in which our farmers have to operate, the rules and regulations will be enforced fairly on everyone.

We do an enormous disservice to our farmers if we fail to recognise all that they have done in the past and are doing now to produce our food as efficiently as possible, and in looking after our countryside, for which, sadly, they receive more brickbats than compliments. We owe our farmers a great deal, and we should acknowledge that.

Currently, we have surpluses. That means that we have too much food. I acknowledge the existence of surpluses in some commodities and in some areas, but something inside me tells me that it is a bold nation, or perhaps even a bold world, that says that it has too much food. Setting aside the needs of those parts of the world that are desperately hungry, I have a real fear that if we are not careful the day may come when we do not have too much food. It is one thing to have too much food to feed the nation, and an entirely different thing to have insufficient.

Many years ago, when I studied agriculture, there was a nasty disease about that was called "take all". It meant that if a farmer was not careful he could wake up one morning and find that all his cereal crop had been destroyed. That disease seems to have been conquered by breeding and sprays. However, we are still vulnerable to some extent. In the 1960s, Dutch elm disease first came to our shores in its present form, and I was much involved. Since then that disease has almost completely destroyed our elm population. Perhaps the finest tree that we had in our landscape has almost disappeared for ever. It might still survive in isolated pockets, but, broadly speaking, it has been wiped out, and nowhere more so than in East Anglia. I suspect that in many instances farmers have been blamed for the changing landscape, when they have had no control over the change. I was especially involved with Dutch elm disease because of my then occupation, and 20 years later we do not have the slightest idea how to conquer the disease. I do not want to sound alarmist, but sometimes it is right for us to remember that we are not entirely invulnerable.

I have had the gravest and the most specific forebodings about an industry which has been driving forward so well for so many years being put into neutral or, worse still, into reverse. Two things must be tackled simultaneously. First, we must struggle with our European partners and the common agricultural policy to endeavour sensibly and at a reasonable pace to reduce and balance our food production. Many have suggested how that can be achieved. It is essential if we are to curb over-production and contain expenditure, but we must remember that from agriculture's point of view that is a negative approach. Secondly, it is vital that positive measures are taken to stimulate and encourage diversification in as many areas as possible as a way of maintaining the industry's momentum.

A way must be found of achieving international co-operation, both to help the hungry nations of the world and to avoid an international food price war, which would hurt everyone. If certain land is not to be used to produce current crops, as most seem to agree must happen, a much canvassed alternative is tree planting, in which I confess I have an interest. It seems to be a sensible solution, because it would improve the appearance of our countryside, and the land involved, although not available immediately for food production, could be cleared and used again for that purpose reasonably quickly if that were required, and we never know exactly what the future holds. Our huge import bill for timber is well known, and anything that reduced it would be to the country's advantage. Several of our farming organisations and the Ministry itself have produced publications on forestry and woodland management. If this activity is stimulated, it will do nothing but good for the nation.

Many new crops are being experimented with and several hon. Members have referred to the work that has been undertaken. The experimentation should be encouraged. More important in the long term, both cereals and sugar may be used in a variety of industrial processes in manufacturing various chemicals. These may prove important outlets in future.

My last subject is fairness, which is the issue that leads to constant complaints from farmers and various parts of agriculture in my constituency. Whether we are talking about the effect of CAP measures on Britain as a whole and the way that they are implemented in various member states, or whether we are talking about how CAP measures affect us internally as a nation, such as the problems that the co-responsibility levy is causing among cereal growers, compounders and feeders, it is essential that we do everything in our power to ensure that fairness prevails.

If we are not careful, there is a great danger that we shall talk ourselves into a depression. That is easily done, and we must avoid doing so at all cost. It is essential that we pledge our faith and confidence in our farmers for what they have done for us in the past and for what they will continue to do for us in future. We must do all that we can to keep the industry moving forward to prevent stagnation and decline. Finally, we must ensure that the rules, however complicated, are obeyed by everyone so that our farmers get a fair deal. If we do these things, we shall be doing all that we can to preserve the future of farming, and with it the fabric of our rural communities.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I have agreed with many of the things which have been said in the debate, but I want to touch on a crisis that is affecting my constituency and the constituencies of other hon. Members in the north of England and Scotland. The crisis has arisen since the ban on the sale of lamb because of radioactivity. I accept that Ministers have done their best in the circumstances, and I accept what they have done, but I must press my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary on compensation.

I have received letters from my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and I noted the replies by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food last Thursday, relating to compensation. The key issue upon which both Ministers are resting their case is "compensation for severe loss in particular circumstances to specific farmers."

That could mean many things, but the key question which farmers in the North and Scotland want answered is, will compensation be paid? I hope that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary will respond to that when she replies.

The sale of lambs was banned in certain areas for three weeks from 1 July. Fortunately that ban was eased in some areas of low ground last week. In the areas where the ban has been lifted, some 15 per cent. of lambs have failed to pass the grade because they are too fat. This position will deteriorate where the ban still exists and where the lambs are growing fatter.

I went to market on Friday to check and I found that lambs which were not graded in the 22 kilo range, were sold for about £26 or £28. They therefore lost the subsidy of about £15 per head. That is a severe loss to the total profit of the farmers and this has occurred, through no fault of the farmer, on account of events in Russia.

I was glad to see that the Meat and Livestock Commission, Ministers and the graders have accepted this point and have ensured that the lambs which have failed the grade because they are too fat, have been marked in the left ear. This leads me to hope that an administrative solution to the problem is being prepared. Once the lambs are marked in the left ear, purchasers will know that there is no conceivable way that the animals can be graded in future. That tends to lower the market price immediately.

Many farmers in my constituency, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment, and in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Corrie) and elsewhere in Scotland, now have large numbers of lambs to sell. The farmers, the markets and the hauliers are all losing out.

In the past two weeks the position has been complicated through no fault of the Ministers'. The compulsory dipping regulations came into force on 28 June. While the three-week ban was in place, farmers employing good husbandry dipped their lambs because the weather was appropriate for that. The farmers have therefore been unable to sell the lambs for two weeks as that is normal practice. That means that, although there have been relatively few lambs coming on to the market over the past week or so, there will be a flood of fat lambs next week which will have a severe effect on price. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will not delay in giving a firm assurance that compensation will be paid in appropriate cases where lambs have failed to pass the grade on account of being overfat as a result of the recent ban on sales. The sooner that he gives that assurance the better. There is much dissatisfaction among farmers who have been caught out through no fault of their own.

Several hon. Members have claimed that farmers require confidence for the future to invest and prepare long-term plans. I do not wish to overplay the matter but I cannot understate the present difficulties. There are vast overdrafts, falling land values and there has been a big drop in income over the past farming year. I am glad that inflation has fallen to its present low level and that is a great help for farmers. As hon. Members have said, the reduction in interest rates is worth a tremendous amount to farmers.

The debate about the future of the industry has been going on for several years since surpluses became more and more apparent. Although there were tremendous problems about milk quotas and subsequent difficulties facing the milk industry, there is no doubt that the industry can now see a way ahead, and credit is due to the Milk Marketing Boards of the four countries involved. The main grain and livestock sector needs a clear way ahead and a light at the end of the tunnel. Many of the suggestions put forward have been on the fringe, but we must keep our thoughts at the heart of the matter—basic livestock and grain farming at which farmers are expert and have staff of equal efficiency. Craft workshops, tourism and forestry are welcome but represent only fringe elements to the farmers' income, not the part of his farm work which has always provided the main production.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North raised an important point. Positive planning in the countryside is vital. There is no doubt that, without affecting the environment, we can do an immense amount in the countryside to keep people living there, to give them the chance to build houses in the right setting and in the right density and help small developments in very small towns. We must keep a close eye on the rural communities if we wish to maintain the population in the countryside and ensure that facilities are as good in the small towns as they are in larger towns. We must consider the retention of the village hall, the village school and church, its shops and post office which constitute the rural community. We must work towards a rural policy for the future.

The Select Committee on Scottish Affairs investigated the Highlands and Islands Development Board and recommended very strongly that a rural development fund should be set up for the rest of Scotland to perform many of the duties carried out by the Highlands Board in Scotland which are carried out more effectively in England by the Development Commission than the Scottish Development Agency in Scotland. The Select Committee made an all-party recommendation to set up the fund with £25 million and that would do an immense amount of good for the rural economy in Scotland and a similar fund would benefit England and Wales.

We must pay a great tribute to what the Government have done to keep money in the hills and the less-favoured areas through the hill livestock compensatory amounts, the suckler cow subsidy and through the many grants available to farmers. I accept that grants have decreased especially in the case of the farm improvement scheme. I must tell my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, as I have told my right hon. Friend the Minister on more than one occasion, that when reducing drainage grants we must not muddle the normal replacement of drains in arable fields with those drains which might affect the conservation through draining wetlands. That is an important difference as we want to encourage tile drainage in cultivated land.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North, said, there is a great future for agriculture. However, we must make firm decisions about the Government's lead and we must bear in mind that mainstream agriculture is important and that the fringe benefits to be gained by the alternatives which have been suggested—including, of course, forestry, which has a low cash flow and low input of employment — are secondary. We must concentrate on the main stream and I hope that the Government will do that in the immediate future.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I am glad that the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Munro) was able to make his speech, particularly in view of the tantalising trailer in today's issue of the Glasgow Herald, which said:

> "Sir Hector Monro, Tory MP for Dumfries, is expected to press another little thorn into the side of the Scottish Office . . . Sir Hector will be an embarrassment to Mr. Malcolm Rifkind."

I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman lived up to those expectations, but I intend to refer to the point that he raised about the rural development fund for the parts of Scotland that are outside the Highlands and Islands Development Board area. I agree with the points that he made about the need for compensation for sheep farmers who have been affected by the ban that was imposed following the pollution from Chernobyl.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) on his double good fortune in securing the debate. He was doubly fortunate because the debate should have gone to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) a few weeks ago, but it was talked out by devious tactics by some Conservative Members. Nevertheless, I join my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow in congratulating the hon. Member for Sherwood on raising this important subject. We for our part would support the terms of the motion, not least because it highlights the Government's failure to give a proper lead to the agriculture industry at a time of radical changes in the circumstances facing the industry. The motion also recognises the existence of a range of special problems in rural Britain, which have been getting considerably worse throughout the seven years that the Government have been in office.

The hon. Member for Sherwood calls for a White Paper on agriculture. Some of us have been calling for that publicly for some time. The Minister fell a little short of refusing it yet again, but we shall see what comes of that in due course. There is no doubt that the industry needs a positive lead to get it out of the mess that it is now in.

The fact that the hon. Member for Sherwood has consistently supported the Government on these and other issues is something that he will have to explain to his constituents some time next year, according to all the leaks. With the best will in the world, I suggest that he may have more time to consider the problems of agriculture after his constituents have delivered their verdict than he has at present, but we shall see.

The debate has rightly centred on the agricultural industry. It has to be said that the industry has been drifting into chaos, along with the common agricultural policy, which is supposed to be supporting it. Some £15 billion was spent last year on the CAP, and the amount is going up again this year. That was 70 per cent. of the Community's budget. In spite of all the resources that are supposed to be supporting the rural economy and agriculture throughout Europe, we have falling employment in agriculture and rising indebtedness for many farmers in this country, as several hon. Members have said.

The CAP is a fairly ham-fisted instrument. It provides an open-ended artificial market for a range of agricultural commodities. We all know what is happening. It is supposed to be helping small producers, but inevitably it is providing a substantial incentive to larger farmers to fill the Community's intervention stores with vast quantities of junk cereals and other surplus stock. I do not necessarily criticise the farmers who are filling those stores—indeed, it would be the height of hypocrisy for me to do so, because I am one of them. But we all must recognise that the system that provides such incentives for people to do such things must be absurd.

Last year the European Community was the proud possessor of about 16 million tonnes of cereals in store. Here in the United Kingdom we started this year with 85,000 tonnes of beef, 240,000 tonnes of butter and other milk products, and no fewer than 5,700,000 tonnes of cereals in intervention store. Make no mistake, there will be more this year because, in the absence of a positive lead to the industry to get away from that farce, it is inevitable that production will continue to increase.

The Government and the Commission keep putting off the decisions that should be taken to control that situation, but there is a growing awareness that something will have to happen. The trouble is that neither the Government nor the industry has a clear picture of what that something will be. The only thing that we are all absolutely clear about is that the common agricultural policy is not working. The hon. Member for Gloucester, West (Mr. Marland) pointed out the amazing fact that last year we spent £2·2 billion on agricultural support in the United Kingdom, but the net farm income of all farmers in the United Kingdom was only £1·1 billion, so obviously there is something far wrong with the targeting of the resources.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food spent his first year or so in office saying that price cuts were the right way to control the production of surpluses. He is wrong, for the very reasons that the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West, among others, gave. A marginal cut in prices would be a spur to increased production. It is possible that the proposed co-responsibility levy will add to the spur to increased production whereas the massive cuts in prices that would be required to suppress production would probably bankrupt a large number of smaller producers. I was delighted to hear in the Parliamentary Secretary's speech that the Government, as of this debate, intend to abandon the ludicrous position of using the price-cutting mechanism to deal with the problem.

The other alternatives are much more specific constraints. Quotas are the obvious one. There has been some support for that idea during the debate. We have heard about the imposition of milk quotas. Even the most fervent supporters of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food would admit that he was rushed into that decision and did not act cleverly. It was a panic decision in its implementation in Britain. It has given rise to unforeseen problems. The most topical one must be tenants' rights to the value of quota when they give up their tenancy on farms. However, I agree with several hon. Members that the system is working. There may well be a case for quotas in other sectors. However, the Minister and the Parliamentary Secretary have been talking about set-aside. We are longing to find out exactly what that means. If it means some sort of subsidy to encourage farmers to fallow some of their land, there may be a case for it. But if it means a longer-term abandoning of land, which was suggested in the structures proposals from the European Commission which we debated last week, there would be much opposition to that suggestion.

Let us emphasise the fact that the delay and uncertainty surrounding the industry just now are extremely damaging. My hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas) emphasised that. Against that background, we see the massive cuts in research and advisory services — £16·5 million slashed off the budget of the Agricultural and Development Advisory Service, 800 fewer advisers in England and Wales, and a 41 per cent. cut in the funding of the Scottish agricultural colleges. This is no time to be cutting back on the research back-up and advice available to farmers. For the Minister to talk about value for money in such circumstances is absurd.

The Opposition say that there should be three fresh approaches within the CAP. First, we emphasise the need for structural change. That means alternative land uses, alternative crops, alternative stock and in particular the cultivation of trees on agricultural land.

Mr. Mark Hughes (City of Durham): It is very good to say that we want alternative uses. Given modern technology producing more food, whether from livestock or grain, to pretend that the way out of excess production is by growing trees is to delude ourselves. We have too many people, too much land and too much technology. We cannot pretend that we get out of that by growing trees.

Mr. Home Robertson: We are trying to be constructive. The growing of trees is one of several alternatives. What the industry needs above all is a positive lead, which it is not getting from the Government. The National Farmers Union has admitted that between 100,000 and 150,000 hectares will have to be taken out of production of existing crops. It is time for positive guidance on that. That is one of the things that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food should be doing.

The second area on which we want to concentrate is the need to negotiate a major shift from the intervention system to alternative support mechanisms, which would help the consumer as well as the farmer. The obvious examples of that are the beef variable premium and the sheepmeat regime, or our old deficiency payment system. There are signs that the French and the Germans may be moving in that direction. We should encourage them.

Thirdly, there should be better targeting of support, especially for smaller farms and less-favoured areas. To achieve that, we must repatriate many of the nuts and bolts of the CAP. We must get the local decision-making done in Britain rather than Brussels.

At national level, we must restore ADAS and build up a rather different land bank from that which has been talked about today, to make more land available to let to people who want to come into the industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) has talked of that before. It is a scandal that it is so difficult to start a career in farming.

The Labour party has an excellent record when it comes to our relationship with agriculture. It was a Labour Government who brought in the Agriculture Act 1947, which provided the basis for the industry's recovery after the war. When we were in office until 1979 we tried to guide the industry on the way ahead by publishing White Papers setting out our general objectives. There has been no White Paper on agriculture since 1979.

The industry does not know what it is supposed to be doing. The National Farmers Union of Scotland says in its journal this week:

"the British Government's attitude — so far as we can discern it—seems less than lukewarm and is uncertain.

This is part of the general complaint that the Government has no strategy for the countryside, that there is no sense of purpose for producers in the more peripheral regions, and policy makers have no clear notion of how we shall enter the next century with a countryside as a place in which wealth is created".

The industry does not know what direction it is supposed to be going in.

Mr. Lord: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Home Robertson: No. I am sorry, but there is not time and the Minister wants to reply.

There is more to rural Britain than agriculture. There are many long-standing problems in rural Britain which have been aggravated by the Government's economic policies and other aspects of Tory dogma. Rural unemployment is a growing problem in many areas. We have the problems of conservation and the environment, the rural housing crisis and the disruption of already poor transport services by the Transport Act 1985 and perpetually high fuel costs. Government spending cuts and successive rate support grant cuts have had an impact on a range of services and on schools, which are important in rural communities.

It is in response to that challenge that organisations such as Rural Voice, in England and Wales, and the Rural Forum, in Scotland, have been set up to try to fight the corner for rural communities. I have experience of the threat through the proposed closure of my village school, which my children attend. I am acutely conscious of how fundamentally important such services are to rural communities. I am delighted to say that people in my constituency have succeeded in fighting off the efforts of the Liberal chairman of the education committee and the former Conservative administration in Lothian regional council, which wanted to close rural schools. One cannot over-emphasise the importance of schools and housing in rural communities.

It is important to emphasise the serious poverty that is to be found in many rural areas. In its spring edition of "Poverty", the Child Poverty Action Group says:

"approximately 25 per cent. of households" in rural Britain

"were living in or on the margins of poverty."

In such areas, costs, including transport costs, are higher than elsewhere. Much work must be done to sustain services to create jobs and to make life more tolerable in rural areas.

The hon. Member for Dumfries mentioned the need for a rural development fund. We both represent part of the rural south of Scotland which does not have the benefit of a specialist rural development agency. The Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, of which he is a member, and the Confederation of Scottish Local Authorities presented a powerful case, supported by the Rural Forum, for a modest rural development fund to help the Scottish Development Agency and local authorities to promote services and employment in those areas, but they were rejected out of hand by the Government on the most spurious grounds. The hon. Gentleman and I can make common cause on that. There is an urgent need for a development initiative to create jobs and sustain services in rural areas.

There is a serious crisis in rural communities today. It takes an insidious form and we cannot leave it to market forces to find a resolution. It will take a Socialist Government, who are prepared to intervene, to overcome those problems.

Mrs. Fenner: With leave of the House, I should like to reply to the debate. In view of the shortage of time, hon. Members will have to rely on getting a note from me.

I again congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart). I am aware of the anxieties that he expressed, especially in regard to getting some forward plan. As for a White Paper or a similar document, I said earlier that a great deal is going on in Europe at the moment and we would want to set out such a document only if it were not in danger of being changed immediately.

I listened with some interest to the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), who would spend a great deal of money. He mentioned marketing, but obviously failed to take account of the fact that we promoted Food from Britain with £14 million. We are the first Government to have promoted a marketing organisation. We are continuing to put our money where our mouth is by giving £1 for every £2 which comes from the industry.

Several hon. Members were worried about research and development, but £200 million on agricultural research and development and food development is not a measly sum. I understand that a letter from the alliance was sent around, saying that a spending standstill would be imposed on agriculture under alliance policy. The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) admitted in the House on 6 May during a debate on the Finance Bill to my hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury that that letter had been sent out and that there would be a spending standstill. I do not therefore plan to take instruction from the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North about how to support agriculture when he would put a freeze on support for it.

Does the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) believe that the Labour Government's policy of fixing land tenancies for three generations did anything to make rented land available? That is why we introduced the Agricultural Holdings Act 1984——

Mr. Home Robertson: It does not work.

Mrs. Fenner: It has not been working long enough for the hon. Gentleman to make such comments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) is anxious about the marketing of lamb. My information is that the average market price continues to strengthen—over last week's price, and over that for the same week last year. The general picture is that trade is improving. Rejection rates have been falling. If my hon. Friend has additional information, we must examine it, and I should be obliged if he would supply me with it.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow asked about the comments of the National Federation of Site Operators. I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's comments are drawn to the attention of my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, who is apparently responsible for these matters. The hon. Gentleman also mentioned horticulture. I assure him that the Dutch have stopped support for their glass horticulture industry—it is not necessary with reduced energy prices. The case is being presented in the European Court. If it succeeds, we shall press for recovery of the money that has been paid. The hon. Gentleman also asked about the Salmon Bill. The business for next week has not yet been announced, so I cannot say when it will return to the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) was worried about swine fever. He realises that we have to determine the origin before we can seek any banning operations. He complained about the delay in obtaining samples from Weybridge, and I shall have to look into that specific point.

Many questions and points were posed by two of my colleagues who have apologised because they have had to leave the Chamber, and perhaps I shall have to write to them as well.

This has been a useful debate. Hon. Members have had the opportunity to express the concerns that farmers have clearly expressed to them. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood on choosing a subject of such interest to so many hon. Members. We have noted his request for a White Paper or a similar document.

It being Seven o'clock, proceedings thereon lapsed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 6 (Arrangement of public business).

Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill

Order for consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now considered,

7.1 pm

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): I beg to move, That the Bill be considered on this day six months.

The consideration stage of this Bill has been given quite and exciting send off. It is not often that I read what I have always loosely regarded as being an up-market newspaper —Lloyd's List. It is not essential reading for me, but I read it today and it gives an exciting trailer about the Bill. It states:

> "It has been one of the hardest fought non-Government Bills to have come before the House of Commons in recent years, involving issues of fundamental difference for the two sides of the House — private versus public enterprise, a planned economy versus laissez-faire, and to some extent, the position of the trade unions, particularly in the dock industry".

As part of this exciting preliminary, the article names the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) and myself as two of the leading dramatis personae in the debate. Therefore, whatever the course of the Bill, we can at least say that it has had an exciting introduction.

In opposing this consideration in principle, and in debating the Bill on Report, one is for all practical purposes doing two things. The first is making a judgment on the Committee's conclusions after that Committee had heard weeks — in fact, months — of evidence and a variety of sumbissions from the promoters and petitioners. Secondly, this stage of the legislative process offers the House an opportunity to argue detailed amendments now that we have seen the Bill as amended. As the debate progresses, my hon Friends and I will speak in more detail to the new clause and the amendments that have been selected.

The Bill is likely to prove a watershed in private Bill history, because during its legislative passage there was dissatisfaction in some quarters as a result of certain things that occurred during the procedure on the Bill. That has prompted thoughts which I understand may assume more formal procedural shape about the whole privatte Bill procedure.

At present, the point I am making is that careful scrutiny is needed because the whole procedure enables commercial companies, such as the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company, and absentee landlords, such as Trinity college, Cambridge, to make a profit out of commercial development while at the same time they are able to circumvent normal planning procedures.

I have formed the conclusion that this Bill and others can be a backdoor way around normal planing obligations that a developer would have to undertake through the normal framework of planning procedures. It is my view that the entire private Bill procedure, as experienced from the history of this Bill, ought to be examined.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Did the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company have the option of taking any course other than through the private Bill procedure?

Mr. Weetch: I would have preferred the whole thing to go through the normal local planning procedures, but I appreciate that intervention. I should point out that I took no part at all in the Committee debates. I did not even go to hear evidence, because as the main opponent I kept out of it altogether. I believe that the advantage of the normal local planning procedures is that they enable more local people to be involved.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Surely the company could have put the outline in the Bill and proceeded with it following a local planning inquiry if the go-ahead was given. That would have offered the objectors the best of both worlds. They could have objected to the principle on the one hand and the details at a planning inquiry on the other.

Mr. Weetch: My hon. Friend is authoritative on these matters. I certainly accept that his suggestion would have been a much better alternative. However, there is consensus about the fact that we should have procedures under which the maximum number of people can give opinions and make objections if they wish to do so. There should also be the maximum local involvement in a development such as this.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): As I understand it, the Bill gives general development order status to the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company so that it becomes its own planning authority. I hope to speak later about the virtues of the port of Liverpool. One of the problems there is that the same powers exist. That has resulted in a scrap shredder being erected opposite residential properties without the need to consult the local community or the local authority. That proposal has been opposed not only by myself and the Labour party but also by local Conservative Members of Parliament. It has also been unanimously opposed by the local authority, yet there is nothing that we can do about it.

Mr. Weetch: My hon. Friend is anticipating a number of points that I shall make later.

I have tabled amendments that indicate that for a long time the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company has been exempt from planning procedures. I shall quote chapter and verse from schedule 12 to a planning and development order dated 1977 to show that that is so. At this stage I content myself by saying that my hon. Friend has a point that will be developed later in the debate.

There is no need to go over much of the old ground. I say that because many issues arising from the Bill provide new subject matter for fresh debate. That brings me to the brass tacks of my case. I dispense with further preliminaries and come to the main conclusions that were announced at the Committee Session on Wednesday 12 March this year. In stating the main conclusion, the Committee said, in essence, that the Bill should proceed and made several other points that would command general assent in the House.

First, on page 2 of the minutes, the Committee stated:

"The Committee believes that for commercial and strategic reasons Britain must have ports which are capable of providing the service that is expected of them in the market place by the users."

That is absolutely right and a conclusion of fundamental truth. Secondly, the Committee said that there had been a strategic shift of port capacity to the east coast, and that is absolutely true. Thirdly, it said that since the port was due to expand in a north-westerly direction up the Orwell estuary in an area of outstanding natural beauty, a higher standard of proof was needed than in an average case. The Committee made those three points well, and they are all unexceptionable. The main pronouncement certainly was not.

The crux of the case for the Committee's conclusion is given on page 4 of the Committee's minutes, in the penultimate paragraph, which states:

"The only real alternatives, it seems to us, to Felixstowe are Southampton, London and Harwich; but these ports have a variety of problems which discourage their growth and they have not shown any active intention to expand the provision of container berths. It therefore appears that there is no alternative port to Felixstowe."

If that is the substance of the case, the proposition does not reach the first fence because, apart from any interpretation of the evidence, it is factually untrue. The proposition from the conclusion is that Felixstowe is the only real practical possibility for the expansion and development proposed in the Bill. That contention is so manifestly unsound that it might have been proposed in error. However, it is on the record, so I shall examine it closely.

According to the Committee, Southampton, London and Harwich are not suitable for this type of growth because certain problems discourage their growth and they have no active intention to expand. During the debate, hon. Members will speak in favour of ports in other parts of the United Kingdom and the Committee's contention will be examined in rather more detail than I can examine it now. I can give the House only one example, which related to Harwich and the Harwich Parkeston Quay Bill which is now in Committee.

On Second Reading of that Bill the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) said:

"the principle of the Bill is to create new quays, vital for our growing trade, with no damage to the environment and to reclaim land which will become valuable industrial land with admirable port facilities."—[Official Report, 28 April 1986; Vol. 96, c. 718.]

That seems strangely at odds with the Committee's main conclusion that Harwich has no intention of expanding, therefore leaving Felixstowe as the only alternative. Not only is that contention unsound, but it is factually inaccurate and does not stand up to the evidence. At the end of the day we are arguing about a more fundamental principle, because a private Bill should stand the test of an examination of realistic alternatives, which there never was because of the Committee's faulty conclusions.

Quite the reverse is the case in respect of Harwich and Parkeston quay. Three hundred and thirty acres of mud-flats are to be reclaimed, a substantial sea wall is to be constructed, and four deep-sea container berths are to be created for handling 100,000 containers a year. The overall cost of the investment is £100 million. If I relate that factual information to the Committee's conclusion, far from being discouraged, and far from being devoid of an intention to expand, the evidence suggests that Harwich has every intention of expanding and that there is the intention of creating a deep-sea container complex that will rival Felixstowe itself. I am on record as supporting the Harwich Parkeston Quay Bill. If we are to have a substantial deep-sea port in East Anglia, it should be at Harwich, not on the Orwell estuary, because there are few, if any, environmental problems in Harwich.

All my argument stems from the factually incorrect information in the Committee's minutes. The conclusion reached on the evidence about a central problem, which this Bill and other Bills like it set out to explore, is at issue and is critically important. I and many other hon. Members were seeking guidance from the Committee on the problem. It is the Government's overall intention, from a general statement of their environmental policy, that this and other developments like it should not go ahead where environmental matters are at stake, unless there are overriding reasons of national importance. What is the flow of evidence and reasoning for overriding national importance in this case? What development should be allowed in the Orwell estuary to be consistent with it and with its designation as an area of outstanding natural beauty? That question should have been answered, but was left as much unanswered at the end of the Committee's proceedings as it was at the beginning. The Committee gave us no guidance whatever.

I remind the House of the factors that come together in the Orwell estuary. Besides being an area of outstanding natural beauty, it has been designated as a site of special scientific interest, a site of international importance under the Ramsar convention on international wetlands and an area identified under European legislation as of importance for bird conservation. The key question for the Committee, which is not only of particular interest but of general principle, is: what economic case can override environmental factors of that order and significance? It has to be pretty formidable before we can accept that there is such an overriding national interest.

Mr. Sayeed: That point is dealt with on page 2 of the evidence given on Wednesday 12 March 1986 to the Committee, in paragraph 4. Both the petitioners and the promoters agreed, although there was disagreement as to the exact figures, that there would be a need for three deep-sea container berths by the mid-1990s, if not sooner. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, the Harwich and Parkeston quay, even if that Bill is passed, will not have been built by then. It was accepted by both petitioners and promoters that there was a national need. Given that only Felixstowe was prepared to fulfil that need, the Committee decided to allow the Bill to proceed.

Mr. Weetch: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that information. Although I do not agree with the conclusions of the Committee, I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues for the diligence with which they examined the information. There was a mountain of work, to which they stuck to the end. Credit is due to them. The hon. Gentleman's intervention may help to underline my next point.

The conclusions revolve around what is the overriding national interest in the matter, and this was the central point of argument in the Committee. Critical evidence on the subject was given and argued in the sitting of Tuesday 25 February this year. The argument was not only of particular importance. It was of general importance. I have looked carefully at the evidence. When we debated the Bill some months ago, I gave my opinion on what the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company had put forward and I shall not go over that again, but certain things emerged.

First, what was being argued by the company was not in the national interest, but was in the commercial interest of the shareholders. It is not to be assumed, even in an emerging laissez-faire economy, that the interests of shareholders are always identical with those of the community. Secondly, the national interest could never be determined because there was never any yardstick by which to measure it. All the evidence as to future trends and variables, such as alternatives to Felixstowe, contained a vast amount of speculation in which one person's statistics were often as good or as bad as those of another.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Have the Government not consistently withheld information on their calculation of what a fixed Channel link will mean in terms of taking container traffic from the deep-sea ports? The Minister has repeatedly been asked that question and has refused to give an answer.

Mr. Weetch: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I shall come on to deal with what the Committee did and did not do in debating the fixed link and cargoes of transhipment. Some of the evidence gives at least a partial sign of lack of thinking on that point.

On balance, this is a matter of one overriding national interest against another. Port facilities are a national interest, as are conservation, an area of outstanding natural beauty, an SSSI, international wetlands and bird conservation. The company never demonstrated, because Solomon himself could not have demonstrated, the balance of interest between those two factors. At the end of the day, it is a matter of judgment and opinion. The company could never prove beyond all reasonable doubt that there was a case for expansion, because it is not possible to prove it. What is more, the company could not even prove the case on the lower standard of the balance of probabilities, given the evidence that it submitted.

Given that statistical and economic trends turn on matters of opinion, where the company has a commercial axe to grind anyway, an examination of the evidence shows certain things. The main aim is said to be the development of deep-sea container facilities, but the main growth of deep-sea trade has been due to the penetration of containers into deep-sea cargo, most of which, according to the economic ports experts, is virtually complete. Development can come about only from substitution and intrusion into the employment and trade prospects of other ports.

Secondly, as time passes, less containerisable cargo remains, and at the end of 1984 only 1·8 million tonnes remained to be containerised. In terms of port capacity, this represents between two and three deep-sea container berths. Not only have I looked at the evidence, but I have had a number of people who are quite used to port and traffic statistics looking at what the Committee had before it. In coming to its conclusion the Committee ignored other factors — for example, the Channel tunnel fixed link, which will consume a good deal of political time in the House before we are finished. The Committee ignored transhipment via France, which at present is not important but will be an unpredictable factor when the Channel tunnel opens. There is no consensus on what will happen if that ever sees the light of day.

Mr. Sayeed: If the hon. Gentleman reads the evidence given to the Committee, he will find that the Committee asked specifically for figures after allowance was made for traffic going via the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Weetch: I am just about to quote from the evidence given by the managing director of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company in response to the questioning by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fachett) on 4 December 1984. On page 15 my hon. Friend asks Geoffrey Parker, the managing director:

"Before we leave the point about the Channel Tunnel, whatever form that takes, I assume that the company has made some projections as to the likely impact of various schemes upon your trade at Felixstowe."

That was a good question.

The Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company had come to prove its case for an overriding national interest, but had made no projections about the possible effect of the fixed link on trade. I do not know whether people who read these things and who are experts in port matters think that the company put up a strong case. When one complicates the case and asks why Felixstowe and not somewhere else, given the environmental obstacles to development, the case for the expansion of Felixstowe becomes pretty gimcrack.

Too many environmental questions have been left unanswered. This expansion in the Orwell estuary should not proceed, because too many environmental factors come together all at once. Even if it were only an area of outstanding natural beauty, that would be enough to throw great doubts upon it, but since it is a site of special scientific interest and has been indentified under the Ramsar convention, and since the European directive is also involved, all these other aspects are also involved. If ever there were a case for the environmental interest, on the balance of advantage and the evidence, being stronger than the economic and commercial interest, this is a clear example of it.

7.30 pm

The Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company does not have a very strong case. I relate that to the Government's written answer on 29 July 1982 about areas of outstanding natural beauty, when the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) said:

"The Government agree with the commission's view"— that is the Countryside Commission—

"that, in general, it would be inconsistent with the aims of designation to permit the siting of major industrial and commercial development in AONBs. Only proven national interest and lack of alternative sites can justify any exception." — [Official Report, 29 July 1982; Vol. 28, c. 708.]

Nobody can argue that the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company proved its case beyond all reasonable doubt. Emphatically that was not the case.

A good deal of the environmental evidence was put to the——

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Before the hon. Gentleman reaches what I divine to be his peroration, does he not think that the statutory duty that is laid upon the county council and the district councils to look after environmental matters has been effectively discharged, in so far as those local authorities are now satisfied and have withdrawn their objections to the Bill? Why does he think that he knows so much better than the elected local authorities of the area?

Mr. Weetch: I can answer that question directly. To its shame and eternal discredit, the local authority that had most of the responsibility for scrutinising this legislation which short-circuits the planning procedures —namely, the county council—never even petitioned against the Bill. To go back a little into the history of the county council's scrutiny, the county council's planning committee rejected the whole idea because it was contrary to the terms of the Suffolk structure plan. However, by political jiggery-pokery the county council managed to get it pushed into a siding and then agreed not to petition.

The county council stands accused of dereliction of duty. At the end of the day, it had a responsibility to scrutinise the legislation on behalf of the ordinary people but it never did so. It is also a fallacy to argue that just because Suffolk coastal district has dropped out it is satisfied with the Bill. It may have been satisfied with the compromise that was reached, all in all, but that is not the same as saying that the authority is satisfied with the Bill. My view is that it will come to regret the fact that it did not scrutinise the matter more closely.

Mrs. Clwyd: I am most interested in my hon. Friend's account, but does he not think that the question of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) was most peculiar? It seemed to imply that it is wrong to criticise conclusions that are reached, however they may be reached, by a local authority, be it a district council or a county council, because it consists of elected representatives. Does my hon. Friend think that the hon. Gentleman would show the same restraint and would fail to criticise Labour local authorities for their actions, because they, too, are composed of elected representatives? Does he not think that it was a very odd question?

Mr. Weetch: Yes, I do indeed. Right from the start there have been all sorts of odd things about the Bill, and I have no doubt that there will be odder things about it before it is finished.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Before my hon. Friend leaves his point about the planning requirements, although he has dealt effectively with the attitude of the Suffolk county council to the Bill, surely the crucial argument, to which he may be about to refer, is that, because of the private Bill procedure, those who would have objected under the normal planning procedure have had an incredible cost and burden imposed upon them and feel very unhappy about the fact that they have been deprived of the ability to make their case effectively. I think my hon. Friend will agree that those who have petitioned against the Bill are still very unhappy in many respects about it.

Mr. Weetch: Yes, that is a fair point. The private Bill procedure that was used in the 18th century for the various enclosure Acts has not changed very much. It is antiquated and is not consistent with the standard of democracy that we are entitled to expect in 1986. I am advised that the private Bill procedure is to be looked at critically, so I shall not stray further down that path.

When one considers the effect that the expansion of this port will have on the environment, however gallant, imaginative and expensive may be the efforts that are made to landscape, ameliorate and disguise the effects of the intrusion by this commercial development, they can never restore the quality of the environment that will inevitably be lost. At best, the landscaping will be only limited in value. It will require half a generation to take effect. Even though it will create peripheral screening, it will be something that is quite unnatural in an area of outstanding natural beauty, with estuarial scenery that is of critical importance to East Anglia. Whatever is done, it cannot alter the change that will take place to the view from the river.

Finally, on ecological grounds, Trimley marshes, with the qualification about their development — this is the area that is to be substituted for what will be lost—will never be a substitute for Fagbury flats. As the Bill is an environmental disaster, my hon. Friends and I have concentrated upon tabling a series of amendments which might yet, if passed, limit some of the environmental damage to the area. I oppose the Bill.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: As I understand it, the motion before the House is "That the Bill be considered upon this day six months."

I am not sure whether that is the motion to which we are speaking at the moment.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Wrong again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): The motion before the House is that the Bill be considered. It is now being considered.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I am obliged. I wished to be clear that it is not the dilatory motion that we are debating. As the promoter of the Bill, I am anxious that it should be considered and completed as soon as possible. It is right that I should comment on some of the extraordinary allegations by the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch). Not to put too fine a point on it, his speech and the efforts of his colleagues tonight are designed not to protect the environment, to advance the cause of the other Suffolk ports, or to protect the national interest, but to wreck it for the worst possible reason—revenge.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: No, not until I have made my point.

Mr. Fatchett rose——

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I shall also give way shortly to the hon. Gentleman. There is plenty of time this evening.

I said that the principal motive of the hon. Member for Ipswich and his colleagues is revenge, and the reason is clear. The militant London end of the Transport and General Workers Union has never forgiven the port of Felixstowe, the dockers of Felixstowe and the local branch of the TGWU of Felixstowe and East Anglia for having worked during the abortive dock strike. It cannot forget that, and it is determined, if it can, to get its own back on a private enterprise port that continued to work and on the dockers who continued to assert their right to go to work during a strike when there was no proper ballot. That is the principal motive of the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues. There is no argument about that. The hon. Gentleman is trying to wreck the Bill out of spite.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) to cast aspersions and to allege that Labour Members are not interested in opposing the Bill for environmental reasons but oppose it only at the behest of a trade union? May I ask what your ruling is on that point, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for debate. Various allegations are made every time I take the Chair. It is a matter for debate, and certainly not a matter for me, fortunately.

Mr. Fatchett: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) to attribute motives to my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch)? I listened to my hon. Friend's speech carefully and I enjoyed it thoroughly, but at no stage did he refer to the London docks or the TGWU——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is a question of alleging various motivations behind speeches. That is not a matter for the Chair.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I now give way to the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald).

Dr. McDonald: I thank the hon. Gentleman for having the decency to give way at last. He made some utterly disgraceful allegations — allegations that were without substance — about our motives. Many of us have a constituency interest in the matter, because we represent dock areas where jobs may be adversely affected. What right has the hon. Gentleman to suggest that we are not acting properly in our capacity as constituency Members of Parliament, and only in that capacity, in raising issues which will seriously affect our constituencies? What right has the hon. Gentleman to make such absurd and disgraceful allegations? After all, let us face the fact that many of the hon. Gentleman's speeches are made because he is a paid representative——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) will be trying to catch my eye, but she has made her first speech.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I was referring primarily to the hon. Member for Ipswich, but if the cap fits the hon. Lady, she should wear it. I now deal with the hon. Gentleman's speech before I come to the substance of the matter before us.

Mr. Fatchett: We shall all enjoy the hon. Gentleman's speech but it would be helpful if he could clarify his preamble before he deals with the points raised by my hon. Friend. In that preamble he said that the motive was to wreck "it". I was not sure, because the sentences got mixed up, whether the reference to "it" was to the Bill or to the national interest? Or does the hon. Gentleman equate the Bill with the national interest?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I have not yet reached the national interest, but I assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that I shall.

I was dealing specifically with the motivation of the hon. Member for Ipswich. I have been at a loss to understand why he still tries to wreck the Bill. If I believed for one moment that he had the support of the people of Suffolk, I would understand it, but of course the local authorities, the county council and the Suffolk Coastal district council in whose territory the port lies, have all considered the matter in the greatest detail and with the greatest care. They are clear that it is in the interests of the people of their areas that the Bill should become law. There can be no suggestion that the hon. Gentleman is representing the considered best interests of the people of the area. It might be thought that at least he is representing Ipswich, but unfortunatly in this case that is not true either. The local authority in Ipswich has never petitioned against the Bill. It was open to it to do so, but it chose not to.

Mr. Weetch: Ipswich borough council never petitioned against the Bill because it put its trust in me to oppose it. I have done that right from the start to the best of my ability.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman can put a gloss on it, but the fact is that his borough authority decided not to petition against the Bill. It might have been thought that because Ipswich is a municipal port and, in the early stages at least, its chief executive, Mr. John Evelyn, was unhappy about some of the navigational aspects of the Bill, at least the Ipswich port authority would have petitioned against the Bill. But it did not do so. As a result of the debates in the House and negotiations that took place between the promoters and the port of Ipswich, a happy compromise was arrived at, and consequently the port of Ipswich has no objections to the Bill. I must start by asking who it is that the hon. Gentleman represents in his desire to wreck the Bill.

Mr. Weetch: My electors.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman says his electors. Let us consider that. Many people in Ipswich vote Labour. They voted the Labour members of the Ipswich port authority into office. I take it that that is what the hon. Gentleman would regard as local democracy, but that elected local authority has not opposed the Bill. Moreover, in Ipswich many people, as in Felixstowe and the rest of that part of Suffolk, work in the docks industry. If they are not dockers they may be haulage people or employed in the service industries that support our ports industry. What is their view? The TGWU in East Anglia, including those who democratically represent the dockers of Felixstowe and Ipswich and the rest, are clear that they want the Bill to be passed.

They have said that their local Member of Parliament's objections to it are frivolous and malicious. That is their view, not mine—[Interruption.] I do not have to rely on the views of the trade unions, the local authorities or the people of Ipswich. I am saying only that it is difficult to understand whom the hon. Member for Ipswich represents. There is virtually a full house against him. The local authorities, the dockers union and, as far as can be discovered, the people of the area are against him. One is therefore entitled to ask whom he represents and who has put him up to try to wreck the Bill.

One can draw no other conclusion than that the hon. Member for Ipswich is seeking to wreck the Bill because a certain militant section of the Transport and General Workers Union, totally unrepresented in East Anglia or by the dockers of Ipswich, Felixstowe or Harwich, put him up to wrecking the Bill. There can be no other explanation. The hon. Gentleman said that the question whether Felixstowe's expansion was in the national interest had not been properly considered. Apparently, he has not thoroughly studied the work or report of the Private Bill Committee.

I have with me the Chairman's conclusions. Indeed, I notice that my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) is in his place, and he was also a leading Member of that Committee. But the Chairman said:

"The Committee believes that for commercial and for strategic reasons Britain must have ports which are capable of providing the service that is expected of them in the marketplace by the users and we should not be content just to have ports which are there to transship goods to and from continental ports . . . There has been an agreement in certain aspects as far as figures are concerned, though I am bound to say there have been a number of assumptions on both sides that have been made as far as future growth is concerned, but certainly there was agreement . . . that Britain may need two or three more deep-sea container berths by the mid 1990s . . . there was disagreement as to where these berths could be developed. It is clear, and I think beyond doubt . . . that port customers have transferred from the west coast of Britain, and it would be unrealistic to suggest that they are going to return there. The only real alternatives, it seems to us, to Felixstowe, are Southampton, London and Harwich".

Mr. Allan Roberts: They are wrong.

Mr. Griffiths: I am quoting the Committee's report, not mine.

It continues:

"but these three ports have a variety of problems which discourage their growth and they have not shown any active intention to expand the provision of container berths. It therefore appears that there is no alternative port to Felixstowe, and since we accept the national need for expanding deep-sea container provision, we believe that that need does exist, that then there is a case for expanding Felixstowe in the national interest. In the opinion of the Committee, therefore, the commercial case for Felixstowe expansion is sufficiently weighty to satisfy us that the development of Felixstowe should be allowed."

I read out such a long quotation simply because the hon. Member for Ipswich alleged that the national interest had not been adequately considered. But the Committee weighed that question carefully and made a measured judgment. I have quoted it, and it is clear-cut.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: The people from Southampton could not make any observations to the Committee because, as a result of the procedures, they were not aware of the Bill's promotion at the very time when they should have been submitting their objections. But Southampton has permission for one, if not two, additional berths to take that sort of trade. The House recently debated proposals for Harwich, which would allow further development. I understand that there are also proposals for Tilbury and for places along the north coast such as Hartlepool and places on the Tyne. But the Committee heard none of that evidence because of the problems involved in trying to submit petitions and in trying to understand the procedures of the House.

Mr. Sayeed: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Griffiths: Of course I shall give way——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) should not intervene in an intervention or we shall get nowhere.

Mr. Griffiths: Perhaps I should continue for a while, and then give way later.

My response to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) is that I was dealing with the allegation by the hon. Member for Ipswich that the national interest had not been adequately considered. I demonstrated, I think beyond peradventure, that the Private Bill Committee spent a lot of time considering this issue and came to the unequivocal conclusion that the development was in the national interest. The hon.

[Mr. Griffiths]

Gentleman may disagree with the Committee, but I hope that he will accept that the allegation that it did not consider that question has fallen to the ground.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish has said that there may be something going in Southampton, Hartlepool and elsewhere, and that is fine. But his next point did not do the port of Southampton justice. He virtually said that it was so uninterested in its own future that it did not even know that it could give evidence before the Committee. The Committee opened its doors to anyone with a view.

Mr. Sayeed: Does my hon. Friend agree that any Committee that sat for six months would be hard pressed not to hear evidence on behalf of other ports, even if it did come via petitioners against the Bill? The evidence shows that the petitioners made the case for Southampton, London and Harwich, so we had access to information. But we also found, if I remember correctly, that container berths in Southampton had been decommissioned and car berths had been put in in their stead. There are other points, which I hope to make later.

Mr. Griffiths: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that point. However, having given way to almost all and sundry, I should like to draw my remarks to a conclusion.

I hope that I have disposed of the argument that the national interest was not considered. It was, and the Committee reached a conclusion.

The hon. Member for Ipswich also spoke about the environment. I must say that, listening to him, I did not recognise the reality. There was an enormous amount of discussion and debate between the promoters and the petitioners about a whole range of environmental questions. On Second Reading, I said that I would not be a party to the Bill's passage unless the Bill enhanced the local environment. I can say that as someone who was one of the first Under-Secretaries of State for the Environment. As I understand it, the promoters have agreed with the county council, the district council and with many of the other petitioners, on a substantial environmental improvement of which they can be proud. The hon. Member for Ipswich should recognise how much good has come from those negotiations.

This development affects 0·25 per cent. of the total 150 square miles in that area which has been designated as being of outstanding natural beauty. The Felixstowe extension will affect about 98 acres of poor low-lying land of very heavy clay. It is separated by a clay wall from approximately 140 acres which comprise a small area of salt marsh with creeks. The extent of the environmental impact of which the hon. Gentleman is complaining is 0·25 per cent. of that area.

In close co-operation with Trinity college, whose concern for the environment is not in doubt, the dock company has agreed to carry out a large programme of landscaping which includes proposals to plant approximately 500,000 new trees, creating approximately 85 acres of additional woodlands. The dock company and Trinity college have agreed a detailed schedule with Suffolk county council safeguarding the public rights of way, a new viewing area, development control, highway improvements, light and noise control, and providing free off-the-road lorry parking.

As a result of the representations made by petitioners, there is also to be a 176-acre nature reserve at Trimley marshes, plus the saltings and the sea wall. The dock company will provide £130,000, and Trinity college a further £10,000, to cover the initial establishment costs and subsequent management expenses of the new reserve. These are major environmental improvements.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: If this is all so good, why has the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds felt unable to accept the compromise? I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not claim that it, too, is in the pay of the London militant dockers.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I shall discuss the bird people later.

In addition to the environmental improvements already mentioned, the Bill also substantially restricts the further development of Trimley marshes. I was glad to see a negotiated arrangement requiring the company to operate the proposed new works so as not to exceed specified noise levels. These will be monitored and enforced by the Suffolk Coastal district council.

The environment has been fully safeguarded. Indeed, it has been enhanced. That is why Suffolk county council, and the Suffolk Coastal district council, which have been deeply concerned to protect the environment, have agreed to support the Bill. The extraordinary thing is that, with the solitary exception of the Royal Ornithological Society, everybody, including enyironmentalists, supports the Bill.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish asked me a question which, as an admirer of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, I must answer. I have a letter from Mr. Stuart Housden, the head of conservation planning, and parliamentary agent for the RSPB, to Suffolk county council. In fairness to the House, I should say that the society is not fully able to withdraw its opposition to the Bill, nor voluntarily to enter into a compromise.

Mrs. Clwyd: Why not?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Because it is concerned that to do so might be "interpreted as a weakening of our resolve to defend such sites in the future".

That was the reason given by Mr. Housden for the society's inability to withdraw its objection.

Mr. Housden's letter to Suffolk Coastal district council, which the hon. Member for Ipswich slurred in his speech, began:

"I would like to thank you for your efforts in negotiating with the promoters of the above Bill. I know you have worked hard to find a satisfactory outcome to the concept, proposed by the Dock Company, of an alternative wetland at Trimley Marshes. It is our understanding that the promoters offered an area of 176 acres of arable land on Trimley Marshes for conversion to grazing marsh together with some 20 acres of sea wall and saltings, the whole area on a 99 year lease."

The company offered the money, and a shooting-free zone of 400 yards around the site was also agreed. The management of the reserve would be in the hands of the county council, the district council, or the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. The letter continued:

"The RSPB considers that with suitable management, such as that practised by ourselves at Elmley in Kent and elsewhere, it would be possible to create a worthwhile reserve on Trimley marshes that would probably attract birds in nationally significant numbers."

That statement by the RSPB hardly represents 100 per cent. opposition. I continue:

"The reserve could not compensate for the loss of SSSI land at Fagbury . . . Nevertheless, a reserve at Trimley would be of considerable ornithological interest and superior to anything possible at Levington."

Unlike the hon. Member for Ipswich, the RSPB takes a positive, balanced and measured view of the matter. The society recognises the gains, and regrets some of the losses. Although it is unable to abandon its opposition because of its future position, it lends no support whatsoever to the hon. Gentleman's slur on the county council.

No doubt other hon. Members have a great deal to say. I can only repeat that the Committee weighed the national interest carefully. The environmental considerations have been protected, and the promoters of the Bill have arrived at sensible compromises. The Bill should proceed and the hon. Member for Ipswich does himself no credit in continuing his efforts to wreck it. The Bill offers East Anglia the prospect of more modern ports. It offers the people of Suffolk more prosperity and many more jobs. It offers the nation an opportunity to ensure that the great globe-girdling container lines of tomorrow will continue to stop in Britain, and will not simply divert to Rotterdam or even Le Havre, leaving our country to be a contributor by short, cross-Channel support lines.

The House must decide whether it is in the national interest to ensure that we shall have a port of world standard. If this Bill was offered to Liverpool, Southampton or Bristol, they would jump at it and none of the hon. Members representing those areas would try to wreck it as has the hon. Member for Ipswich.

When the Japanese, the French, the Dutch and the Germans see that, at no cost to the taxpayer, we have the opportunity of investing substantial sums in the modernisation of our ports, which would create many more jobs, and ensure prosperity, which I am sure Opposition Members would wish to see, but that the House of Commons is trying to wreck such a possibility, they will think that we are mad. I believe that hon. Members will not accept such wrecking tactics, and I hope that they will resist the efforts of the hon. Member for Ipswich to destroy the future of Felixstowe.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): I very much regret the personal attacks made by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) on my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) whose integrity is beyond dispute. To present my hon. Friend as someone who is being manipulated by mindless militants is to have an imagination beyond Mr. Derek Hatton's wildest dreams. My hon. Friend is recognised throughout the Labour party as a masterful model of moderation. There may be some on whom the mud might stick, but my hon. Friend is not one. He is fighting a campaign on behalf of his constituents, which every fair-minded hon. Member recognises. He has fought for Ipswich and its people for some years, as general election results in his constituency have successively shown, often against the national swing.

However, there is no doubt what motivates my opposition to the legislation. The Bill should not be considered further because it will detract from every other port in Britain. Britain already has too many deep-water facilities. If the Bill becomes an Act not one new job will be created. Jobs may be created in Ipswich or in that area, but each of those jobs will be taken from another port, including the port of Liverpool which I represent.

There are a number of reasons why I oppose the Bill. First, some aspects of it will be environmentally damaging to the area where it is proposed to site the facilities and my hon. Friends will be dealing with the environmental considerations later.

I have experience in Liverpool of how the kind of general development order planning powers, which are proposed in the Bill, affect local communities. I referred earlier in an intervention to the scrap shredder which will be sited in my constituency. That affects not only my constituents in Bootle but those of the hon. Member for Crosby (Mr. Thornton). Strangely enough, he was a member of the Committee which considered the Bill and he did not oppose the general development order planning powers. Yet at the same time he is supposedly campaigning alongside myself against those powers as operated by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board in the port of Liverpool because they will affect some of his voters and environmental damage will be caused if a massive scrap shredder and scrap mound are erected in an area where, in similar circumstances to this Bill, there is a nature and bird reserve and a wonderful vista.

Also surprisingly, the hon. Gentleman accepts the Committee's conclusion, to which the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds referred, that only three options are ruled out — Southampton, London and Harwich. He does not seem to consider all the ports on the east and west coasts. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds said that he did not want Britain's ports merely to ferry cargo across the channel, between the south of England and the continent, but to compete with the large ports of Europe. If that is so, deep-water facilities do not have to be sited in the south; they can be sited anywhere — on the east coast or, dare I say it, on the west coast. They can be sited at Merseyside in Liverpool. To suggest that Southampton, London and Harwich are the only other options and that they are the only ones that the Committee has considered, is to fail to consider what is in the national interest.

Is it in the national interest to develop a port which will result in job losses in an area of high unemployment such as Liverpool and which might take trade away from Merseyside? That cannot be justified when Britain already has enough port facilities to meet any future projections.

I am also opposed to the legislation because clause 4 is headed:

"Dock Workers Employment Scheme not to relate to any part of limits of dock".

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds said that if the Bill were on offer to Liverpool we would jump at it. I assure him that that is not the case. Any legislation that destroys the dock workers' employment scheme would not be jumped at by any scheme port in Britain. The Bill does not simply extend the port of Felixstowe; it extends a non-scheme port. It will mean the use of non-scheme labour.

8.15 pm

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): The hon. Gentleman knows my interest in the port of Liverpool. Is not one of the major reasons why the Bill was initiated in the first place the fact that a non-dock labour scheme port, as against the labour scheme ports, is able to charge lower landing charges, because it is not burdened with the dock labour scheme? Therefore, will he reconsider what he has just said?

Mr. Roberts I hope to prove that Liverpool is now one of the most successful ports in Britain because it has a dock labour scheme. If non-scheme ports were developed there would be considerable difficulties and problems with labour relations, which would penalise the ports. If one considers the success of the freeport in Liverpool, developed by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, one sees that it has become Britain's premier freeport. In its first year it handled £24 million-worth of goods from more than 300 companies, and volumes in the first quarter of this year show that traffic through the United Kingdom's largest freeport will far outstrip its first-year figures. Individual consignments of cargo and complete shiploads are creating work for employers of the port of Liverpool which would otherwise not have been available.

Let me tell the hon. Gentleman why that is the only successful freeport that the Government have established that has been successful. It is because it is a scheme port and before it was established the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board negotiated with the Transport and General Workers Union an agreement of what was scheme work and what was not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. Gentleman was tempted by the intervention, but we must get back to the Bill.

Mr. Roberts: I accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not want to be ruled out of order by simply speaking about the port of Liverpool and not discussing the Bill.

I and many of my hon. Friends who have constituency interests in representing ports other than the port of Felixstowe have a legitimate right to oppose the Bill and the port's development since the Committee did not consider all the alternatives and it is not in the national interest to develop extra deep-water facilities in a country that already has too many.

The Seaforth container terminal and the grain terminal in my constituency are successful and under-used. Yet at a time when there are such massive facilities under-used, the Government who believe in the free market are telling us to create more facilities which might or might not be under-used and might not only be under-used but may take jobs away from other ports even more hard hit than Felixstowe.

For the reasons that I have given, the Bill should not be further considered. It is an extension of a non-scheme port, it gets round planning arrangements, which I know can cause tremendous problems, it is not in the national interest to have ports closing, and the legislation will have environmental consequences.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): In my years in the House I have been recognised as a supporter of the city of Southampton, and that city revolves around its port. I feel that I am the champion of a port which, over the years, has suffered some ill luck, some bad management decisions and some serious misjudgments by the unions.

Only three years ago the port was at a standstill, but I am happy to say that it is now making good progress and is the major port for the import and export of cars. Two weeks ago, through my good offices with the Taiwanese Government, we were able to arrange a twinning with the Taiwanese port of Keelung, which is in the 1 million containers a year category. We hope to encourage more Taiwanese shipowners, not only the Evergreen Line, but Yang Ming and OOCL, to use our container ports. At present, most Taiwanese owners use Felixstowe, where they have a three-year contract on advantageous terms. An extension of Felixstowe would deal a blow to Southampton's hopes of revival.

In the good old days of the European Parliament, my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) appointed me chairman of transport and regional planning for Europe. We should have grasped the nettle firmly at that time and worked out a common ports policy in which the checks and balances would have been settled.

Checks and balances are essential. Is it wise to create a giant container port when increased employment in that area will result in more unemployment in other areas? I do not say that Southampton cannot meet the challenge, because I believe it can. We have tremendous advantages over Felixstowe, including a wonderful geographical position and almost a double tide which remains high for some hours. We can easily work deep draught container ships and there is no delay in services at the Southampton container port.

The over-provision of container berths will present problems, even though we in Southampton feel that we may not be able to cope with what we hope will be the future demand. We are making progress on the container side. It may be said that we are looking for the cessation of competition, but this all goes back to the Government's lack of a common ports policy.

The well-being of our ports and the need for continuity and encouragement of our work forces are important. We are a nation of seafarers and we need a comprehensive ports policy. I have often told my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House that if we had had a debate on a common ports policy, even for only three hours, we might have been able to resolve some of the anomalies that are creeping in.

Of course Felixstowe would like to develop another 730 or 750 acres of land. Southampton does not have 750 acres to develop, though we could provide a useful service with only another 30 or 50 acres.

It will be wrong for the Government to support the Bill, which must stand on its own feet. I oppose it, not because I am opposed to the private sector or to the fact that Felixstowe is not a member of the national dock labour scheme — though that gives it an advantage — but because the Bill is not related to the United Kingdom's ports requirements. As a seafaring nation, we need to keep our ports alive. Should we do that by providing increased competition at every hand? No. We must create an adequate ports policy by negotiation and dialogue and by planning for the future.

I am sure that the Bill will receive the assent of the House, but I shall not support it, because it is the product of convoluted thinking. The idea that we need another 730 acres of container berths is sheer nonsense. We could provide many acres of container facilities in Southampton. Our work force is bringing its costs down to the Felixstowe level, despite the fact that Southampton is a national dock labour scheme port.

Even my friends in the Transport and General Workers Union would agree that having to pay for jobs that are not required is a financial handicap. Southampton has been a scheme port for a long time and has suffered for that reason.

The suggestion that Felixstowe competes with us is inaccurate, because we compete under a liability. We have always stressed that fact. The new Associated British Ports company has said that it would welcome the abolition of the national dock labour scheme, but the TGWU is wedded to it. However, this is not the time to discuss that subject. I have told my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary that anomalies must be cleared away and that there must be free competition and no political or financial bias against Southampton.

I note what the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), who has left the Chamber, said about the freeports. That was an imaginative Government scheme. I hope that the Government support it, although it contains some curious anomalies. I thought that the freeport scheme was only the beginning of the advantages for Southampton, because Felixstowe was excluded from the list of freeports.

I hope that tonight, whatever the outcome of the vote, we shall all agree that before long there must be a debate on a national ports policy. I am sure that the Department of Trade and Industry will welcome that. I am certain that all responsible hon. Members representing a port area will want to know that the future of that port is openly discussed and that there is no need to send letters to colleagues. I hope that the national scheme will take precedence over the private Bills.

8.30 pm

I am sad. I am not always keen on the people with whom I have to go into the Lobby. I do not mean that in a derogatory sense, but it is embarrassing for a well-known moderate Right-winger to be seen in the Lobby with the other side. When we come to vote I shall be forced, reluctantly, because of the lack of a national ports policy, to oppose the Bill. Southampton needs every promotion and support that the Government can give. I am sure that the Bill is not the way to promote Southampton's cause.

Dr. McDonald: I listened with great interest to the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill). He defended his constituency interests properly and legitimately. I only wish that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) would understand that many of us are here because we intend to defend our constituency interests.

I want to discuss the minutes of evidence taken by the Committee on Wednesday 12 March 1986. I wish in particular to talk about page 2 of those minutes, which deals with the principle of the Bill. The minutes say:

"The only real alternatives to Felixstowe are Southampton, London and Harwich. But these three ports have a variety of problems which discourage their growth and they have not shown any active intention to expand the provision of container berths . . . There is no alternative to Felixstowe . . . Since we accept the national need for expanding deep-sea container provision we believe that the need does exist and that there is a case for expanding Felixstowe in the national interest."

I want to discuss the reference to the national interest and the alleged lack of any active intention by Southampton, London and Harwich to expand the provision of container berths.

I do not presume to comment on Southampton's position, because that has already been done and it is not in my constituency. I shall not presume to comment on Harwich. However, I shall discuss the port of London, because the major part of it is located in my constituency. Tilbury docks are responsible for 17 per cent. of the total national container traffic in this country each year.

It is alleged that Tilbury has taken no active interest in developing container traffic. That is not true. It is useful to consider some examples from the series of press reports provided by the Library in computer printout. On 7 June this year the Port of London Authority's Tilbury docks announced that it had won another major shipping service and said:

"The first vessel on Baco Line's well-established revolutionary barge and container service between Europe and west Africa was successfully handled in dock over the Easter weekend. . . . PLA was pleased with the fast turnaround performance effected by the workforce on this initial ship."

Further ships were expected in the next few days and in the coming months. A port authority does not make such an announcement if it is not interested in developing container traffic.

I can give more examples of the developments at Tilbury. Tilbury does not confine itself to container traffic, but is developing all sorts of other services such as roll-on, roll-off ferries linking Tilbury to Zeebrugge. It does not concentrate particularly on container traffic.

Lloyd's List reported in September last year on the privately owned, multi-purpose west African terminal at Tilbury. It said that it "is rapidly gaining a reputation for fast ship turnrounds and a productivity handling rate that compares with the top continental ports. At certain times the 108 PLA . . . registered dockers load 100 tonnes of cargo and 15 containers an hour which is the highest productivity rate in the Port of London. Another attraction of WAT is its total flexibility".

That is obviously an extremely important consideration. The west Africa terminal handles 10 shipping lines from all over the world, in particular focusing on trade with west Africa.

The report went on to say that by the end of 1985 the west Africa terminal

"expected to handle . . . 100,000 tonnes of container cargo. This should be sufficient to reach a break-even position."

The report added:

"In July last year the Port of London Authority announced that the last great untapped market—China—was beginning to fulfil its potential. The expansion in the market is now being reflected in increased container sailings to the People's republic. At the end of this month there will be a weekly service from Tilbury to south east Asia and China."

That is just a random selection of examples of expansion in container traffic at Tilbury. It is all facilitated by the agreement of the Transport and General Workers Union to work flexibly to ensure a fast turnround for the ships and to ensure that Tilbury is competitive. How does that fit in with the claim that Tilbury has shown no active inclination to expand container berths? It is nonsense.

The managers and workers—not just the dockers, but the white collar workers—want to develop container traffic at Tilbury. Tilbury has the facilities to do that. Furthermore, Tilbury has an important location and realises the need to develop all the potential of that location. It is next to the Dartford tunnel and the M25 which encircles London and connects to the main motorways to the north and south of England. Therefore, it is an extremely important location and Tilbury is well aware of the need to expand and exploit that potential in the development of its container traffic. As I have said, management and workers alike are determined to do that. Therefore, the claim in the Committee's evidence is patently untrue. I do not see how the Committee can seriously have considered evidence and reached a conclusion of that kind. It should have made sure that it had gone through every item of the expansion of container traffic in Tilbury to clarify the truth or falsity of the claim that it was making.

I can understand the reference in the evidence that the ports have a variety of problems. For example, Transport pointed out in March and April 1985, in a special detailed survey of United Kingdom ports—I wish that it was the sort of thing that the Committee had read, because if it had done so it might have come to different conclusions—that there are problems of the past. The spokesman for the PLA who was interviewed for the article made it clear that the PLA was aware of the problems. He stressed that the strikes of 1984 had, fortunately, caused far less damage than was at first thought and that the port had recovered very quickly from them.

The Port of London Authority has, of course, to cope with the burden of historic debt, and that presents the PLA with a problem in the development that it would like to see take place. It considers that the Government could take a much more active part than they do by providing money to dispose of the problem of historic debt. However, that does not prevent Tilbury from endeavouring to develop in every way possible. In fact, the article goes on to report the refurbishing of the London cruise terminal, as it is now called, where 100 passenger ships call in at Tilbury every year. It adds:

"The port has also been encouraged recently by a healthy amount of short-sea container traffic".

That is a significant statement, made in a detailed survey about what is going on in United Kingdom ports. One can only conclude that in this part of the evidence the Committee did not know, and perhaps did not care about, what was going on in other United Kingdom ports as long as it could reach this facile and false conclusion about the lack of interest in developing container traffic in other parts of the country.

Mr. Sayeed: Has the hon. Lady read the evidence to which we listened? If she has, she will recognise that the statement that she has just made is incorrect.

Dr. McDonald: If the Committee had fully considered the implications of the kind of evidence that I have just put before the House, it could not possibly have reached such a conclusion, unless the conclusion had nothing to do with the evidence.

Mr. Sayeed: Answer the question.

Dr. McDonald: I have answered the question. When the hon. Gentleman finally gets up to make his own speech, rather than intervening in everybody else's, I should like to hear how he managed to ignore evidence of that kind, because it certainly cannot lead to the sorts of conclusions that the Committee arrived at, as the hon. Member for Southampton, Test and myself are making clear. After all, it is the port of Southampton and the port of London which the Committee primarily attacked in the conclusions that it outlined.

Inevitably, as a constituency Member of Parliament, I have to look at the implications of the development at Felixstowe for Tilbury docks itself. It is worth the House bearing in mind that we are looking at the development and extension of a port, broadly in the south-east of England, East Anglia, where there are already 19 ports of various kinds in operation. That is a large number of ports and it is just a small proportion of the number of ports and docks facilities throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. As the hon. Member for Southampton, Test said, there is a need for a proper national ports policy. I shall come back to that when I speak about whether this development is in the national interest.

8.45 pm

In Tilbury docks there are now 1,200 dockers and 1,400 white collar workers. It is the largest employer in my constituency. Of course, it is not just a question of the number of people who are directly employed by the docks. The presence of docks, especially if they are functioning well, gives rise to all kinds of ancillary employment. The ratio to which it gives rise is generally estimated at 3:1. There are all kinds of workers involved in my constituency, whether they be members of Customs and Excise, police, pilots, tugsmen, lightermen, carpenters or electricians, or whether they are providing various kinds of service for the port. All their jobs depend on the continued healthy existence of those docks.

I know that very often people get the impression that unemployment does not occur in the south-east. However, unemployment in my constituency is running at about 16 per cent. and there are over 7,000 people out of work at present. Any squeeze on Tilbury docks through the development of a huge and unnecessary container facility at Felixstowe docks could lead to further unemployment in my constituency, not just directly in the docks, but throughout the constituency. That is one important reason why I am taking part in the debate. The last thing that I want to see is any further growth in unemployment in my constituency. We have already suffered enough over the past seven years, where we have seen unemployment more than double in Thurrock. We do not wish to tolerate any further unemployment, especially when it arises out of an ill-considered scheme of this kind.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: There is nothing to prevent the hon. Lady's port and the dockers from providing a better service. If they provide a better service, surely the container traffic will go there and not to Felixstowe. Is she afraid of competing?

Dr. McDonald: Listening to the hon. Gentleman's contributions to the whole of this debate, I fail to understand why he is involved in a Bill such as this when he knows nothing about the subject. He does not understand what is involved in the number of ports in this country. It is not a question whether I think that Tilbury can compete. I have spent a great deal of time explaining how hard Tilbury is pushing in terms of competition and how it is striving to develop the container facilities that it already has, making sure that the maximum flexibility in working is achieved so that a fast turnround service can be provided.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) says that ports should be built and should compete with one another. Each extra port that is built will destroy a part of the environment. The worst thing that could happen would be for the Felixstowe project to go ahead and to be unsuccessful. That would result in the natural habitat of the bird life being destroyed, and at the same time no jobs would be created. That would be the worst of all worlds.

Dr. McDonald: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am trying to get across to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds, who does not seem to understand these issues, that adding to over-capacity merely transfers jobs from one area to another.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) and I have crossed swords on this issue on a number of occasions. The hon. Gentleman prays in aid of the fact that he was once the Minister with responsibilities for the ports. God help us all if he had those ministerial responsibilities now. My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) are saying that there is only so much capacity for our ports to handle. The fundamental issues are where that capacity lies and where strategically the nation wants it to lie. Neither I nor the hon. Member for Test is prepared to accept that the entire movement of shipping and cargo capacity should be channelled through one East Anglian port. That would not be good on national terms. My hon. Friend is saying that present capacity is such that we need a balanced approach in the way in which distribution is arranged between our ports. If we develop Felixstowe, we shall put out Southampton and Tilbury, and that is something that my hon. Friend and I cannot accept.

Dr. McDonald: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. We must be thankful that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds is unlikely ever to be responsible again in a ministerial capacity for our ports. At least that will prevent damage being done in that way. If the apparent instructions of the chairman of the Conservative party to Tory agents are to be believed, it seems that a general election can be expected in June 1987. When the election takes place, we shall all welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) as the new Minister with responsibility for our ports. We know that we shall then have a sensible and coherent policy that will take national interests into account, as well as the national development of our ports.

Mr. Hill: I think that the argument is commercial and not political. Over-capacity in any commodity means that those who are trying to buy the commodity — in this instance container cargoes — have a much stronger weapon for pushing the price down and down. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) and others are saying that Felixstowe is making a good commercial practice of containerisation. With over-capacity, however, it could find its prices being forced down by Chinese, Taiwanese and Hong Kong shipowners, who have no respect for the national interest and who look for the best possible contract for their container traffic.

Dr. McDonald: The hon. Member for Test has made an extremely interesting intervention. He is looking to the consequences of the extension of container facilities at Felixstowe. If the extension takes place, other ports will be pushed into difficulties, and when that happens it is likely that we shall find ourselves with a white elephant.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) has said, we cannot develop and extend port facilities in isolation. Account must be taken of container lorries, which will need suitable roads. If these roads have not been made available before the development and extension of the port, they will have to be constructed. Some of the evidence that was presented to the Committee suggested that communications between Felixstowe and the rest of the country had been vastly improved. I have a personal acquaintance with the roads in that area, and I accept that there have been some improvements, but the roads are not really adequate to allow heavy traffic to travel between Felixstowe and the rest of the country.

Apart from the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish about the bird sanctuary, I think that considerable environmental damage will result. It is damage that need not be imposed by the development of Tilbury. A motorway network is already in place and greater use could be made of the river. The river should be used to a far greater extent, because it is a natural motorway throughout London. If we were to develop existing ports where a road network has already been established, and where, as at Tilbury, there is a natural link that could be used to a greater extent so that goods could be transported up and down the river — lorries could be used from the various stages along the river — we would lessen the environmental damage done by the development of ports and remove the possible damage of the development of the container berths at Felixstowe.

Mr. Fatchett: I am interested in the development of the economic argument, especially as it attaches to the national interest. If there is surplus capacity and we add to it, we may well have the impact to which my hon. Friend has referred, which would involve redundancies and port closures. There is another possible impact, or a combination of the two. If marginal costs are spread over a lower level of demand because of the surplus capacity, they could increase. That would make British ports uncompetitive with foreign ports. Therefore, rather than being in the national interest, it may be against the national interest to extend our capacity when there is a surplus in demand. The result would be to make our ports more expensive vis-à-vis our competitors and we would lose jobs in another way, through a combination of possible port closure and redundancies or from a loss of trade with other countries. Would my hon. Friend comment on that possibility?

Dr. McDonald: That is an extremely important point. My hon. Friend said that British ports may become less competitive than continental ports. Hon. Members on both sides of the House are aware of the fact that British ports already find it difficult to compete with continental ports. That is not due to a lack of facilities or because of problems caused by strike action or disagreement about what does or does not constitute dock work. The source of the problem of competing with continental ports arises largely from the fact that continental ports such as Rotterdam or Hamburg are heavily subsidised by local authorities or by central Government. That makes it very difficult for British ports to compete.

The fact that some ports in Britain have been so successful in ensuring that container and other port traffic comes to British ports, shows the extent to which people are prepared — I mean management and employees — to work together. The danger that arises——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) making an intervention?

Dr. McDonald: I am not, Mr. Speaker. I am making my speech.

Mr. Fatchett: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The intervention was mine.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I have only just entered the Chamber.

Dr. McDonald: My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) gave way to temptation and made a rather long intervention. However, I hope that that will not prevent him from catching your eye later in this debate, Mr. Speaker, because I am sure that he has an important contribution to make.

Mr. Sayeed: Before the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) leaves her central point about capacity and surplus capacity, does she accept that it is not simply a problem of the amount of capacity but a matter of where that capacity is located? As I represent Bristol, I know what it means to build capacity in the wrong place. One reason why the Committee was in favour of the development was that Felixstowe demonstrated that it was in the right place to take the traffic which was heading for western Europe. Does the hon. Lady accept that the problem is not whether we can use redundant or other capacity in Liverpool, Bristol or other ports which ships do not want to use, but rather that the only alternative to Felixstowe would be Rotterdam, Antwerp or Bremen?

Dr. McDonald: I do not agree with one word of the hon. Gentleman's intervention. I have already said that in the whole of the south-east—I use the term in a broader sense than it is normally used—there are 19 ports. Tilbury docks in my constituency is well placed to deal with traffic from western Europe and elsewhere. The important point is whether the docks are well placed in terms of ease of distribution of goods once they have been unloaded. The important point that I was trying to make is that Tilbury docks is ideally located, with motorway and railway provision in place. Furthermore, the river is under-used and is another means of distributing goods once they have been unloaded.

Mr. Stott: I was interested in the intervention of the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed). I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, representing that constituency and the port of Avon, understands that Rotterdam, Antwerp and Bremen are very heavily subsidised by their national Governments. Tilbury, Felixstowe, Harwich, Liverpool and Southampton pay an undue burden of light dues, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) has already referred. It is because they have to do that that they are on the margins, and uncompetitive with the rest of Europe. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman's argument about competitiveness should be directed towards the unfair competition of the European ports against our ports. That is the point that my hon. Friend is making.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. Lady replies, I remind hon. Members that the debate is about Felixstowe.

Dr. McDonald: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was referring in particular to the conclusions of the Committee's evidence, where it was claimed that not only Southampton, London and Harwich had no active interest in developing containers, but that the only port that should be developed in that way was Felixstowe, and it was in the national interest so to do. It is that part of the claim in the conclusions of the evidence that is the matter for dispute. That is why one has to go into the issues not only of the location of various ports around the country, but why some should be developed better than others.

The hon. Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) said in his intervention that location was what mattered for Felixstowe. The point that I have been making is that location, in the sense that he meant it—that is, ease of access for western European traffic—was much too narrowly defined. Location has to take into account ease of distribution. Anyway, location is not the only point at issue in relation to competition with continental ports because there is also the issue of subsidy for continental ports, which is done either on a local authority basis or a central Government basis. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman's argument that because Felixstowe is in a particular geographical spot, it should be developed, is much too narrow a view of what it means to develop a ports policy in the national interest.

Mr. Sayeed: That is not the point that I made.

Dr. McDonald: It is what it sounded like. Either that or the hon. Gentleman simply cannot put his points clearly.

I now wish to turn my attention to the claim that the development of Felixstowe is in the national interest. I should also like to refer to what the Government have said. On page 1 of the Government's report on the Bill, they state:

> "The Government's policy towards port developments is that port users are best served by allowing ports to compete with each other on price and quality of service, and that the distribution of traffic and the pattern of future developments should be determined primarily by commercial considerations. It follows that Her Majesty's Government does not consider it appropriate to attempt to lay down a detailed plan or framework for the operation and development of Britain's ports."

That is the Government's attitude towards the Bill. Obviously, no one disagrees with the point that ports should compete with each other on price and quality of service. There is no dispute about that.

However, the paragraph implies that the Government abrogate their responsibility entirely, with no plan and no framework for the operation and development of Britain's ports, as though it should just be left to accidental commercial interests, when the development of a ports policy affects so deeply the nation's economic development.

Mr. Hill: This is where ports policy fails so utterly. About three years ago, there was talk of developing Falmouth into a giant container port. Geographically, it would be excellent—it would make Felixstowe seem a second-class port. Everybody knows that there is another 12 hours steaming to get to Felixstowe, and when international carriers work out their costs, they do so on steaming times. The Falmouth container port fell with a whimper, however. Nobody heard the end of it.

We might be going wrong in that a ports policy might rely on the Government paying for the infrastructure. We must consider what geographical locations will suit the type of trade and client that we hope to attract. If we could develop that into a reasonable formula, we would have no hesitation in saying that Falmouth is unacceptable because of lack of infrastructure and that Felixstowe is unacceptable because it is congested and another 12 hours steaming time away. There might be many other reasons why we would say, "Here is a balanced ports policy. We have thought it through and this is the answer."

Dr. McDonald: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, but it is not just a matter of picking out the best development from a geographical point of view or on grounds of infrastructure. I have dealt with that in regard to Tilbury. A development must be the best from an economic point of view. Any port serves as a growth point in the economic development of an area. If a port collapses, many port-related activities, which are often extremely indirectly connected, collapse as well. That can lead to the economic collapse of a whole area.

Mr. Stott: You have asked us, Mr. Speaker, to concentrate our interventions on Felixstowe, but I contend that the Bill could not have been debated on the Floor of the House if the previous Secretary of State for Transport had not withdrawn section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964, which included the words "national interest". I am interested to know where the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) was when I debated this matter late one night, when we objected to the withdrawal of section 9. Ports could not have been developed without the Secretary of State's permission, but the Secretary of State withdrew section 9 to allow this Bill to proceed.

Dr. McDonald rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Lady responds, I must observe that we are debating consideration of the Bill and we should not go wider than that.

Dr. McDonald: This procedure would not previously have been allowed to extend to Felixstowe, as any dock extension worth more than £3 million had previously to be referred to the Secretary of State. It had then to be considered whether such a large development would be in the national interest. I was about to make that point, but my hon. Friend did it for me.

I object to this procedure being used for such an extremely important development which should be considered only in a national context. It is a very large development. We already have more than adequate container berths throughout Britain. Not all are operating at full capacity, but there are ways in which the Government could ensure that they did. We have already mentioned some of the possibilities in that connection. That should be part of the Government's policy. It is wrong that the development at Felixstowe should take place as a result of a private Bill, when in terms of employment and continued economic growth it will adversely affect the constituencies of many hon. Members on both sides of the House. In many cases, it will prevent economic growth in other areas which hitherto has been sadly lacking and which has cost us dear. It is wrong that a Bill such as this should come before the House in this form. The Government should consider what kind of container development should take place and where.

9.15 pm

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The fact is that a private company wishes to spend its own money on expanding a port, yet it requires the consent of the House of Commons to do so. But the House need only consider whether there are sufficient public objections to prevent that expenditure. It is not for the House to tell people how to spend their money—simply to say that they ought not to do it if that is what the national interest requires. The Committee considered that matter very fully.

Dr. McDonald: But plainly the Committee did not reach adequate and acceptable conclusions. The hon. Gentleman said that the Bill was about a private company spending its own money. That is true so far as it goes, but in doing so it damages not only the national interest but employment prospects in other constituencies and other dock areas. The private company will not pick up the bill for that. Public money is inevitably spent as a consequence, and that is the issue about which we are concerned. It does not seem that that matter was properly considered by the Committee.

Infrastructure is not privately provided. That must be provided by the state and by taxpayers' money. I am not saying that in this case the private Bill procedure is illegitimate. I am merely saying that the Government are sidestepping their responsibilities. They ought to be concerned with national ports policy. They should not have made the kind of statement they did in response to this Bill, that the "Government does not consider it appropriate to attempt to lay down a detailed plan"— we could perhaps argue about the word "detailed"—

"or framework for the operation and development of Britain's ports".

Personally, I would prefer the word "framework". It is mad for a Government to say that a framework for the development of Britain's ports is not their responsibility—

Mr. Stott: It is absolutely crazy.

Dr. McDonald: No other European Government would take that view.

Mr. Stott: Absolutely correct.

Dr. McDonald: They would take the view that the development of a framework for their ports was a Government responsibility. Indeed, they take it so seriously that they make sure that funds are provided by using more than one method of providing such funds.

Given their response to this Bill, the Government are behaving quite disgracefully. They have refused to face up to the fact that extra container berth capacity will add quite unnecessarily to total container handling capacity in this country. They have given up the sort of responsibility that a Government should have. The Minister looks vaguely puzzled, as though it could not possibly be the Government's responsibility to concern themselves with a framework for the development of ports. All I can say is, thank goodness he will not be doing the job for much longer.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): It may be helpful if I intervene briefly and restate the Government's position, which is that we are neutral about the Bill. The Government came under some attack from the hon. Members for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) and for Wigan (Mr. Stott), who aided and abetted the hon. Lady from a sedentary position. She did not need much aiding and abetting, but he supported her nevertheless. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport said in a speech on 13 May, the Government have a ports policy. It is different from that of the Labour party, but that does not mean that it is not a policy.

Dr. McDonald: It is not a policy.

Mr. Spicer: As the hon. Lady conceded——

Dr. McDonald: It is not a policy.

Mr. Spicer: The hon. Lady is now saying that it is a policy, so at least she agrees on that, although it is a policy with which she disagrees. I thought that part of the thrust of her argument was that there was no policy. Our policy is to allow ports to compete freely for traffic at a price and to provide what services they can.

The hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) suggested that capacity was some finite concept which, through the grand design of some Labour planning authority, would be parcelled around the country, presumably with various criteria attached to it. I think that the hon. Lady accepted that when she allowed his intervention, but that is not how we see the matter. We do not see capacity as a finite concept. We believe that by competition and making our ports more efficient than ports abroad we can attract more business and so extend capacity.

The Government are neutral on this Bill, as they are on nearly all private Bills, but we shall not accept from the Opposition that we have no policy towards ports. Our policy on this matter, as on others, is infinitely preferable and more beneficial to the country than anything which the Opposition can offer.

Mr. Stott: What is the Government's policy?

Mr. Spicer: The Government's policy is to provide the context in which ports can flourish.

Mr. Stott: That is meaningless.

Mr. Spicer: It certainly is not meaningless. [Interruption.] I shall come to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill).

As is normal practice with private Bills, the Government take a neutral position on this Bill. Arguments for and against the Bill have been deployed and, as is customary, we argued in favour of the Bill being considered in Committee. The position now is that the merits of the Bill have been thoroughly examined by the Committee where witnesses were heard and questioned, in some cases at great length.

The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) was sufficiently generous to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed)—and I think that his generosity also extended to my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mr. Thornton)—on his diligence. I must quickly put it on record, as he did, that he did not agree with my hon. Friends' conclusions. He said that they had been diligent. Indeed, they have broken some sort of record because they had 23 sittings in which to assess the evidence.

The Committee examined not only the detail but the evidence on which the basic clash of interests could be judged. As has been stated, the interests were those of the industrial use of the site and its scientific importance as a conservation area. The Committee has recommended the passage of the Bill with various important amendments and safeguards. The House is not very likely to get a clearer judgment on this admittedly difficult clash of interests. The Government accept that that is the difficulty.

As the Committee has taken this view, and as the procedures for dealing with private Bills are there, the Government must recommend to the House that the Bill be allowed to proceed. On that basis, I make such a recommendation.

Mr. Hill: Before my hon. Friend sits down, will he clear up a point? He said clearly that the Government—rightly so—were prepared to see commercial interplay between ports so that the survival of the fittest and most efficient would be the aim of a ports policy. In other words, he is saying that we in Southampton would have to compete with Felixstowe as a commercial entity, and we are prepared to do that.

I know that the Government are a little worried that the Jones-Aldington agreement, which was made some years ago but has never been reviewed, puts an unfair financial bias on the port of Southampton. If my hon. Friend is clear, as I am sure that he is, that future Government policy will mean that the National Dock Labour Board, or the national docks programme will be resolved by Parliament at some later date, I can find no opposition to his argument. However, at the moment, we are commercially disadvantaged simply because we have a private company, privatised by the Government—Associated British Ports—which still has the hangover of the Jones-Aldington agreement, which has meant that there is a financial bias. If my hon. Friend will give me the understanding that at some future date, perhaps many years hence, this anomaly will be resolved, I can agree with him.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This debate is about Felixstowe rather than Southampton.

Dr. David Clark: We oppose the Bill. I am sorry that the Minister felt it appropriate to support further consideration. When it was proposed, the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), with whom I have engaged in many debates over the years, made one of his weakest points. He made a rather strange speech, which was an odd way to advocate to the House the Bill that he was offering on behalf of the promoters.

To make the allegation that we were opposing the Bill simply because we were in the pay of the London dockers was most disingenuous, and most unworthy because that is not his normal way of approaching debates. However, when I heard the weakness of his case, I realised why he had to make personal attacks on my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch), who has strongly argued the case against the Bills with great skill and determination.

I want to deal mostly with the enviromental objections to the Bill. The case is not as it was presented to the House by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds. First, I must add my voice to those of hon. Members on both sides of the House who have tried to set the case for the expansion of Felixstowe in the general context of our ports policy. No mention has been made of it, but at least in passing I must mention that in the north-east of England there are ports that would have liked to receive adequate consideration. However, the Committee did not, we feel, consider their case adequately.

9.30 pm

When the Committee looked into the matter it forgot Britain's defence strategy. It is widely acknowledged that this country's defence capability involves, as part of its commitment to NATO, the defence of the Greenland gap and the reinforcement of Norway. That can be achieved only if there are viable ports along the east coast of England, not only in the south-east. That argument also militates against the Bill.

The twin arguments against the Bill relate to the environment. Although this issue has been debated in the past the Opposition believe that there is new evidence and information that ought to be considered and that the information is of such a character that the Bill ought not to be allowed to proceed.

The area that is the subject of the Bill is a key part of the River Orwell site of special scientific interest. It has been notified under and is subject to the safeguards in section 28 of a very inadequate Act. Nevertheless, it is the best that we have. I refer to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. In the early 1970s the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds had a good record on the environment. He is familiar with countryside and environmental legislation. Hence, I was surprised by his disregard of the environmental arguments against the Bill.

Apart from our national obligations, since the time when the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds was a Minister in the Department of the Environment a further international dimension has been added, mainly in the form of the European Commission directive relating to the conservation of wild birds. There is abundant evidence of the national and international standing of the area that we are discussing in terms of its bird population. It is a very special area, and its designation as an area requiring special protection above its SSI status was made under the EEC directive relating to birds. This was noted by the Committee and verified by it. This piece of land is designated as an extra-special area. The Government's adviser, the Nature Conservancy Council, recognises its status and has proposed officially to the Minister that it should be listed. The former Secretary of State for the Environment noted this status in Hansard on 18 July 1985.

All this information was available to the Committee, but there is scant evidence that its members took full account of the international gravity of the area's status and of the nature conservation issues when they weighed in the balance the national need and the local need for deep-sea containers. I make that point with force because there are dangers in the private legislation procedure. I refer the House to the minutes of evidence of 22 January 1986. Mr. G. J. Parker was cross-examined on behalf of the promoters of the Bill by Mr. K. Standring, representing the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. Mr. Standring asked:

"I have only one final question to ask you. You may not be able to reply to this, and please say so if it is outside your competence. Could I ask: If you gain the powers sought under this Bill, would you expect your new Act of Parliament to over-ride the provisions of the Wildlife and Countryside Act as regards that part of the Bill site which is a site of special scientific interest?"

Mr. Parker answered:

"Much as I hate doing so, I have to say that it is outside my field of competence, and I do not know the Act."

Mr. Ryan, counsel for the promoters, intervened helpfully and said:

"I suspect that that is within the field of competence of lawyers, and I am advised that the answer is 'yes'."

This private Bill has been through special procedures, and tonight the promoters want us to give it further consideration. They acknowledge that it will override a national Act which also has international connotations. The result can only be a serious risk that this Government and Parliament will yet again have action taken against them by the European Commission. The Bill needs further consideration and serious amendment before it can be taken any further.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds made great play of the fact that there had been no environmental opposition. But the Government's advisers, the Nature Conservancy Council, discussed all the implications and the fact that the estuary would lose its international importance for wildlife, and in particular for grey and ringed plover and turnstone and said that, having received the Committee's report in March, it had

"advised the Department of the Environment that there are no sites on the Orwell estuary with features comparable to those at Fagbury Flats and that the passage of this Bill would prejudice Britain's international obligations towards nature conservation."

Thus there are serious environmental arguments against the Bill, which have been propounded by no less an authority than the Government's own Nature Conservancy Council.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman has put the matter with great seriousness and clarity. However, in all these matters, a difficult and sensitive balance must be struck. Nearly all economic development has an environmental impact, and the House must balance the advantages and disadvantages. The crucial point is that none of the environmental bodies is any longer petitioning against the Bill. That is not to say that they approve it in full, but they accept that the balance of advantage does not lie in opposing it. Although there is some environmental loss, there is also much gain in the new arrangements that have been agreed between the promoters and the petitioners.

Dr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman has made a serious point. As we both know, one of the major problems for environmentalists is the potential conflict between economic growth and conservation. Every case must be considered on its merits, but I pray in aid the arguments deployed so well by my hon. Friends the Members for Ipswich and for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald). They argued that there is no national interest. Indeed, the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) argued that too. We are trying to balance two conflicting interests: environmental features that are nationally and internationally recognised, and local private commercial interests. In that situation, the balance clearly comes down on our national and international obligations.

I know that in defence the hon. Gentleman will say that all that is taken into account and that it is recognised that there must be some environmental improvement. As the hon. Gentleman has already said, and as the Bill's promoters tell us, no fewer than 500,000 trees will be planted, which would ultimately create approximately 85 acres of additional woodland. But that in itself destroys the raison d'etre of the creation of a site of special scientific interest.

The area has not been created as a special area because there are trees. If one wanted to do that, one would do it in Thetford forest or Kielder forest. It has been designated as a special site because of the mudflats and the estuaries; because of the particular landscape which is attractive and important to the ecological balance of the birds. No matter how many trees, they do not help the issue. Indeed, by planting the trees the situation may be worsened.

[Dr. Clark]

The Bill is ill conceived. It should not proceed this evening because there are far too many damaging environmental factors which have not properly been taken into consideration.

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): I wish to support my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) in his hard work in promoting the Bill. Unfortunately, I have not heard all the debate because I was unable to be here at the beginning, but from some of the interventions that I have heard hon. Members seem to have been pleading for their own port for some reason or other. The Government are right to say that commercial interests should be the paramount consideration in the location of a port.

I remember sitting on the Committee which considered the legislation to nationalise the ports in 1969. I am glad that we stopped it. But then again, the Labour party's policy led to the National Ports Council and the kind of policies that it is advocating and to which I have listened today and, indeed, when we discussed the Harwich and Parkeston Quay Bill which I introduced.

Mr. Stott: The Opposition did not oppose that.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: I am grateful for the support that I received, but my point here is that it is right that this Bill should go forward. I pressed for the Harwich Parkeston Quay Bill because I believe in competition and I am willing to have competition across the estuary from Felixstowe because we can compete commercially with that.

The National Ports Council led to wrong investment in the wrong parts of the country. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) rightly said, it was in the wrong location. The majority of our trade today is being done with the continent, including Germany, and the attraction is to trade through Tilbury—I welcome the fact — and through London, Harwich and Felixstowe, the east coast ports rather than those of the north-west and the west. That is why I find it logical to support the Bill.

I heard the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) talk about NATO policy, but it was a weak point because Harwich and Felixstowe could easily reinforce Norway; our lines go to Esbjerg, Oslo and Bremerhaven.

We are to have a Channel tunnel, but our natural trade routes are to Germany, Holland and Belgium. There is a user commitment to deep-sea container ports and it is right that the House should support the Felixstowe development. I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill), because his views are against the commercial policy that is right for this country.

The natural flow of container traffic, which has been going to Rotterdam, Bremerhaven and Bremen, is through Felixstowe and Harwich. If we do not get that trade, we shall have only the short-distance traffic and will lose foreign exchange. That is why I have no hesitation in supporting my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds.

9.45 pm

Mr. Fatchett: I hope that the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) will not mind if I do not take up his arguments.

I served on the Committee on the Bill, though not through the whole process, and I did not take part in the final decision. I put on record my appreciation of the work done by the hon. Members for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) and for Crosby (Mr. Thornton). That work has been noted and has created the context for our debate.

Some of us disagree fundamentally with some of the Committee's conclusions, but we do not question the integrity of the hon. Members who reach those conclusions. Our debate shows differences between us on interpretation and matters of policy, but there are no doubts about the integrity of those who served on the Committee. It is important that that fact should be borne in mind as we consider the Bill.

Mr. Sayeed: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Fatchett: I shall not develop the mutual admiration society further or it will become dangerous.

The private Bill procedure is relevant to whether there should be an expansion at Felixstowe. Two crucial issues have arisen in the debate. The first is whether it is in the national interest to have this development at Felixstowe and the second is the environmental considerations involved.

The Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport presented a report on the Bill in our 1984-85 Session. Paragraph 2, dealing with the economic issues, states:

> "It follows that Her Majesty's Government does not consider it appropriate to attempt to lay down a detailed plan or framework for the operation and development of British ports."

We can draw a number of conclusions from that paragraph. Most Opposition Members fundamentally disagree with that view. We do not believe in a laissez-faire approach to the development or otherwise of British ports.

However, it follows that it is not inconsistent or illogical for the Government to say that the private Bill procedure is appropriate for the Felixstowe development. They can argue that the private Bill procedure is appropriate for all ports that may want to expand, because the Government have no view on whether expansion is a good or a bad thing. The Government have no policy and no view. They are empty-minded about our ports industry.

It is appropriate to argue that the economic interest can be dealt with in a private Bill, but I am not convinced that the environmental issue can be dealt with in the same way. In an annex to the report from which I have already quoted reference is made to the Secretary of State's response to the Countryside Commission's report of 1980. The report states:

> "The Government agree with the Commission's view that in general it would be inconsistent with the aims of designation to permit the siting of major industrial and commercial development in AONBs. Only proven national interest and lack of alternative sites can justify any exception . . . Each case must be determined on its merits. That is a fundamental rule of our planning system."

I emphasise the words "of our planning system."

In this case the private Bill procedure did not allow the opportunities for full democratic participation and involvement that the planning system would have allowed. The private Bill procedure creates a set of difficulties and constraints for those who object. Those constraints are expensive and require detailed knowledge of the House and its procedures, and of procedures connected with private Bills. A planning inquiry does not work in the same way. Those who object to a decision would, under the planning procedure, have had the opportunity to make their case and to object. If they had had that opportunity in this case they would have felt more at ease with the Secretary of State's decision.

I do not say that objectors would have agreed with the decision because any Secretary of State must take decisions which will offend some people. However, the planning procedures are well known, well tried and well trusted. Over the years people have developed confidence in those procedures. I think that those procedures should have applied in this case. I feel strongly that the private Bill procedure used by Felixstowe is not the most appropriate.

The strongest criticism that can be made of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company is that it abused the private Bill procedure to bypass normal planning procedures. That is a strong criticism. The company did not meet that criticism in Committee or in public discussions.

I can see the justification for the private Bill procedure on the economic front, but environmentally there is no justification for it. The planning procedure should have been used, the Secretary of State should have had a role and the fullest democratic participation should have been allowed.

The economic arguments have dominated the debate. The company has argued that to gain approval for the development it needed to show proven national interest in the development. I contend that that case has not been made out, either in Committee or in tonight's debate.

There was a substantial feeling in Committee that the company defined the national interest as the interest of the company. If the company makes additional profits that might not be in the national interest. The definition of national interest is one about which we can have a great deal of argument. There is no evidence whatsoever to make a simple corresponding link between the interest of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company and the national interest.

I was disappointed on many occasions in Committee when I felt that the company had the opportunity to broaden its argument and lift the horizons of the debate but failed to do so and went for an easy option saying that what was good for Felixstowe was good for this country. Surely, that cannot be the case.

I shall now look at another aspect of the economic argument. If this country were short of port capacity there could be no argument that we would need a development such as Felixstowe. Whether that development would take place at Felixstowe or some other port is another question but, if we were short of capacity, the argument for development would be very strong. However, the Government's document prepared for the Bill contains no suggestion that we are short of capacity. Paragraph 5 says:

"It is often stated that there is already excess capacity in British ports and that the creation of further capacity will be wasteful."

If that is so, where is the overriding national interest for the development of Felixstowe? My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) developed this argument at great length, in great detail and with great cogency. I put one notion to my hon. Friend which I think is important and we should bear in mind. If we have surplus capacity, the tonnage costs will increase simply as a result of that. We shall not be efficient. We shall not be using our capacity to the optimum level. Therefore, almost inevitably, if we add to the capacity we shall increase our marginal costs and have to take one, two or a combination of decisions. Our ports will close down and we shall have redundancies in, for example, Southampton, Liverpool or London.

Mr. Stott: It will also cost money.

Mr. Fatchett: Indeed, it will cost money in terms of a definition of the national interest because public money will be involved. The Government say that they have no interest in port capacity or port development. How sensible it was to hear the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) point out that infrastructure costs fall on the public Exchequer and the public purse. The Government cannot divorce themselves from potential infrastructure costs and therefore, by definition, must have some interest in those costs.

I shall further develop the point about marginal costs. It seems to me that by extending our capacity we could render ourselves less competitive than our European rivals. In those circumstances we could be responsible for reducing this country's ability to compete and reducing the number of jobs that will be available in British ports. Those who have tried to make the economic case in terms of the national interest have failed to do so on a number of occasions this evening. In terms of the overriding national interest the evidence is very strong indeed.

I shall now comment on what has happened in the port industry over recent years. That will show the weakness of the economic argument.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Legal Aid (Scotland) Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Malone.]

Orders of the Day

Legal Aid (Scotland) Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 3

DUTIES OF THE BOARD

10.20 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to move amendment No. 1, on page 3, line 14, after 'functions', insert under section 1(2)(b) of this Act'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 2.

Mr. Wallace: Clause 3(4) was well discussed in Committee. That discussion revolved around two questions — did the clause as it stood mean anything, and, if so, did it have a sinister meaning? Those of us who fear that it may have sinister possibilities were frightened that because of the way in which it was drafted it could give the Secretary of State for Scotland virtual carte blanche when telling the board what to do. That was a particular fear, having regard to the debate about the board's composition and its being a creature of the Secretary of State in terms of appointments. The Bill also gives wide powers to the Secretary of State to remove people from the board.

There was a fear that in the guidance given to the board by the Secretary of State under this subsection, it could affect a certain class of applications and in some way be restrictive of the board's ability to grant legal aid.

During the debate in Committee, the Minister sought to reassure us that this subsection had no insidious purpose, and said that it was designed purely to give the Secretary of State the power to issue guidance on the way in which the board conducted the administration of its affairs. Hence my amendment. The House will note that the general functions of the board are set out in clause 1(2), which are:

> "(a) of securing that legal aid and advice and assistance are available in accordance with this Act; and Taking the Minister at his word, the purpose of the guidance in terms of the subsection is purely administrative. The purpose of my amendment is to restrict that guidance to the functions of the board which fall under clause 1 2)(b), namely that of administration. It does that simply, and excludes any possibility that the guidance could be used by the Secretary of State to interfere with the granting of legal aid in particular cases.

The amendment in the name of the Secretary of State probably achieves the same result, and I concede that, but my first question — whether it means anything — still stands. It is said to be the issuing of guidance to which the board shall have regard, but in Committee the Minister was anxious to stress that this was in no way a directive from the Secretary of State. The word "regard" means that the board is in no way obliged to follow that which emanates from the Secretary of State. I wonder whether the clause is necessary. Surely the Secretary of State does not need statutory power to send messages to the board. As I said in Committee, it is unlikely that at a board meeting a member would move that the board passed over a letter from the Secretary of State and ignore what he has to say. Obviously, the board, by its nature, must have regard to what the Secretary of State says to it.

The question whether this provision is necessary remains. The political reality is that it must stand. The Government have made a concession and that is welcome. I would, perhaps, suggest that my amendment is neater, but I would not go to the stake about it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): As the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) said, we debated this matter in Committee at some length. Amendment No. 2 in the name of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State fulfils the undertaking that I gave in Committee to reconsider the wording of the guidance power in subsection 3(4) in order to make it even clearer that while the Secretary of State can give guidance to the board on administrative and financial matters, he cannot give guidance affecting the manner in which the board deals with applications. The new subsection (4A) does two things. First, it says in terms that any guidance given by the Secretary of State cannot affect the consideration or disposal of applications in general, as well as individual applications for legal aid or advice and assistance. Secondly, it says that guidance cannot affect consideration or disposal of supplementary or incidental applications to the board. This would prevent the Secretary of State giving guidance on such matters as the circumstances in which the board should agree to the employment of counsel.

I gave careful consideration to the possibility of amending clause 3(4) to restrict the guidance power to matters covered by clause 1(2)(b), as suggested by amendment No. 1. However, clause 1(2)(b) refers in general terms to the function "of administering the Fund". This could be interpreted widely or narrowly, and if it was interpreted widely, could be taken to include many of the matters which hon. Gentlemen are anxious to exclude. Equally, there would be aspects of the function under clause 1(2)(a), of securing that legal aid is available, in relation to which guidance would be perfectly appropriate and unobjectionable. I think, for example, of guidance as to the manner in which the board publicised the legal aid arrangements and as to the situation of its offices. Both these would be functions under 1(2)(a) rather than 1(2)(b).

Therefore, I prefer the rather more precise provisions in new subsection (4A), and I, therefore, commend amendment No. 2 rather than amendnent No. 1 to the House.

10.30 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I am never clear about the rules on declarations of interest, but perhaps I should say that I am a partner in a Glasgow solicitors firm and a member of the Law Society of Scotland. That may be thought to give me a certain point of view on the proceedings before the House. I regret, as I am sure many hon. Members do, that we are starting an interesting, significant debate at 10.30 pm. Protests were made about that earlier, but, unfortunately, in vain. It means that we shall debate for some time at a rather uncivilised hour of the day, and I regret that. I promise that I have no intention of making up for my absence from the Committee by reliving all the arguments in the amendments. Although I shall not artificially prolong our proceedings, I am sure many hon. Members will support me when I say that we shall not artificially curtail the debate. I hope that there will still be an opportunity for getting further concessions, or, at least, further assurances, from the Minister.

The point was well made by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) that some of us do not like clause 3. The Law Society made it clear that the Government's amendment

"goes some way towards a response to the criticisms in respect of the clause."

That disguises the fact that the Law Society and others have doubts about whether we need such a form of words in the Bill. I cannot help quoting the somewhat magisterial advice of the Law Society. It said:

"The Board is required to have 'regard' to 'guidance'. 'Guidance' is very different from 'direction', and 'regard' is very different from 'accept'. The Law Society cannot therefore comprehend the significance of this clause. The purpose is shrouded in mystery."

I have a pleasant picture of the Law Society as a corporate body failing to comprehend, but that is for another time and place.

It is clear that the Minister's amendment is meant to be helpful, and while he does not solve the problems, conscious of the fact that the more important debates will come later on the agenda, I am prepared to accept his good intentions. Some of us were worried that there would be a possibility of directions being given, not about individual applications, but about classes of applications. The original and generally held fear was that there might have been a general sign from the Government that individuals who were single and living at home with his parents and charged, for example, with a breach of the peace, should be charged for legal aid. That was perhaps an extreme of the argument and we were anxious to see it ruled out. I accept that the amendment goes a long way towards doing that, making it clear that even a generic instruction pertaining to who is eligible for legal aid, or the criteria on which it should be granted, will not be part of the guidance that will be offered by the Secretary of State under this clause.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the mere fact that the Government have given in to our anxieties is a sign that they were justified, and the fact that one has to say in a statute that one will not be doing anything naughty shows that there are powers to do things naughty?

Mr. Dewar: I did not want to rub the Minister's nose in it, so perhaps that comes best from a Conservative Member. I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman for his help.

To some extent, the fears have been allayed. I gather that largely this will be advice about administration, accountancy and related matters, and I can see the Minister helpfully nodding. On that basis, and in the hope that he will continue to nod on more substantial matters later. I welcome the Government's amendment.

I was interested in the dialogue between the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, who saw his efforts, as "neat", and the Minister, who saw his efforts, somewhat ambitiously, as "precise". I do not want to adjudicate, because I know where the big battalions lie. I shall be happy to accept the Minister's advice and his amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment made: No 2, in page 3, line 15, leave out from 'State' to the end of line 17 and insert—

'(4A) Guidance under subsection (4) above shall not relate to the consideration or disposal (whether in general or in respect of individual applications) of—

(a) applications for legal aid or advice and assistance;

(b) supplementary or incidental applications or requests to the Board in connection with any case where legal aid or advice and assistance has been made available.'.—[Mr. John MacKay.]

Clause 7

Application of Part II

Mr. John Mackay: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 6, line 16, at end insert 'this section or under'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 37.

Mr. Mackay: The amendment to clause 7 restores an existing power to prescribe exceptions and conditions about the provision of advice and assistance, which power was inadvertantly omitted in the course of our bringing together the relevant provisions in the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1967 and the Legal Advice and Assistance Act 1972. The related amendment to clause 37 applies the affirmative resolution procedure to such regulations.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 10

Financial limit

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 8, line 4, leave out '£50' and insert '£100'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 6, in page 8, line 22, at end insert

'(4) In the event of an approval under subsection 1*(b)* above being refused, there should be a right of review within the Board.'.

Mr. Wallace: These two amendments relate to clause 10, which puts financial limits on the provision of legal advice and assistance, which is the substance of part II.

Amendment No. 5 seeks to raise the limit applicable under this clause from £50 to £100. I understand that at present the average cost of legal advice and assistance is below £50. This average is arrived at by including within that total cases where little or no expenditure has been incurred because the consultation disclosed that no work needed to be undertaken. However, there are many cases where effective advice and assistance are required. In such cases, almost invariably the average cost will be greater.

The requirement to seek approval under subsection (1) must inevitably take a little time and cause delay. It causes administrative work and must involve some cost. To increase the limit to a more realistic sum while maintaining efficient scrutiny is the way to achieve effectiveness in the important service of providing legal advice and assistance.

Amendment No. 6 follows on from amendment No. 5. If the ceiling of £50 or, as I would wish, £100 is reached, a solicitor may not exceed it, except with the approval of the board. The amendment seeks to provide for a review within the internal mechanisms of the board if approval is not forthcoming on first application.

As I understood the procedure when it was discussed in Committee and elsewhere, it is envisaged that for the purpose of legal advice and assistance those who will be approving and, in some cases, not approving applications to exceed the limit will in many cases be locally based. The amendment is designed to achieve at least some constitency in cases where there has been a refusal. There is now a right of appeal. The Minister announced a concession in Committee. This was a very welcome move by the Government, and later amendments will give effect to that announcement. Therefore, as the Government are now prepared to accept that there should be a right of appeal after applications have been made for either civil or criminal legal aid, it would be unfortunate, to put it mildly, if the right of review that already exists for certain forms of legal advice and assistance were to be taken away.

For that reason, I have proposed this amendment which, within the internal mechanisms of the board, would allow a review to take place if an extension of the limit of £50 or, as I should prefer it to be £100, were refused.

Mr. Dewar: I congratulate the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), who has been ingenious and productive in the tabling of amendments. I sympathise with the aim of these offerings. The uprating of LAA3 from £50 to £100, the point at which an extension has to be sought, is an attractive, perhaps seductive, proposition to anyone who has sat, as I have, in a small room in a small Scottish burgh waiting for the thud of feet upon the stairs bringing business.

An increase to that level would not be unreasonable. However, I am not sure, seductive though the argument is, that this is the appropriate time for such a change. We sometimes have upratings and the matter is considered in other ways, and I should be surprised if the Minister agreed with the proposition in this form. Pink Bombers, as they are known colloquially, are certainly important to the trade, and I know that the Patronage Secretary will be familiar with this form of work.

We are talking about an important safeguard for the individual. The right to obtain initial advice and help with a legal problem is fundamental. There is a case for arguing that £50 is too low a cut-off point beyond which any work has to be authorised by, presumably, the legal aid board. I am sure that it will not be grateful for the additional flood of applications. Thus, although I have my doubts, I certainly understand and sympathise with the aims, but the Minister should look at the issue of the appeal sympathetically. I take the point about the need to be consistent, and in a few minutes we shall all welcome the Minister's decision to introduce a right of appeal in civil and criminal legal aid.

As I have said, the LAA3 procedure, which is largely self-assessment and self-administration, is important. Clearly there will be many applications for extension, but most of them will be self-evidently valid, and will presumably be agreed, but if there is controversy and a refusal, it is not unreasonable that some form of appeal should be allowed, presumably an internal appeal, analogous to the one instituted in other areas. I hope that the Minister will give some thought to the proposition, and will go along with the principle. The present drafting may be unsatisfactory, but I should like to think that he is favourably disposed towards the concept.

Mr. John MacKay: In Committee I explained on a number of occasions that it is the practice in legislation to include the current figure, which now stands at £50 both north and south of the border. It was increased from £40 in November 1983. We keep the situation under review, but no clear evidence of a need for a further increase has emerged. It is of interest that the average cost of an advice and assistance account paid in 1984-85, at £45 is precisley the same as that in 1982-83, the year before the increase was made. The number of requests for increases in 1984-85, at just under 40,000, was the same as in the previous year, despite the increase in certificates for legal advice and assistance to approaching 141,000. I assume that that means that there were 141,000 Pink Bombers. It seems right that there should be a fairly strict limit on the cost of the work a solicitor can do on his own initiative, dealt with under the present schemes. I accept that the administrative costs of authorising increases have to be weighed against the prospective increased costs in advice and assistance if the limit is raised. However, the fact authorisations of increases will rest with the board rather than with individual local committees should serve to reduce any inconsistencies.

These factors are also relevant to amendment No. 6, as this change in responsibility clearly reduces the need for a review procedure. At present there is an appeal from the local committee to the central committee. I understand that there is no appeal against refusal of an extension in England and Wales. I am not convinced of the need for a review procedure under the new arrangements, although this will be a matter for consideration with the board. If necessary, regulations relating to a review procedure could be introduced, but I am satisfied that there is no need for provision on the face of the Bill.

There is a further complication in relation to assistance by way of representation since the introduction of a review procedure could introduce undesirable delays or complications. As I said in Committee, it would be possible to prescribe a higher limit for assistance by way of representation than for ordinary advice and assistance, and I shall certainly be giving consideration to that possibility.

I hope that with that explanation the hon. Gentleman will be prepared to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Wallace: I hear what the Minister says about the fixing of the limit and the practice of maintaining the present situation, but I am sure that he will note what has been said and take the debate as a marker. One can rapidly reach the limit, and the administrative costs of processing an application for approval of an extension is not a small sum.

The question of review is important. The Minister resisted the suggestion in Committee at a stage when he had not accepted that there should be any review at all with regard to civil and criminal legal aid. That has now changed, as can be seen in the amendments that we are about to debate. It seems rather odd that a present right of appeal will be removed at a time when the Government are willing to rights of appeal where they do not presently exist.

We can all look to the practice in England and Wales, as may happen on one or two occasions this evening, and try to borrow from that in saying that the same should apply in Scotland. At other times we take great pride in saying that it should be different. But this is one case where it matters not what happens in England and Wales. An existing right will be removed.

I was encouraged when the Minister said that he believes that the powers given to the Secretary of State under present legislation are sufficient to allow him to make regulations to introduce a review procedure if that should prove necessary. I hope that if the Government are still in power—God forbid that they will be—after at least one year of the new board coming into effect, they, or any incoming Government, will consult the board on that matter.

I cannot accept the Minister's point about unreasonable delays in a case of assistance by way of representation. As was pointed out in Committee, there will be no review if the person concerned does not institute it himself. Therefore, if he is concerned about there being a speedy disposal of his case and feels that a review would lead to delay, the answer is a simple one. That point does not stand up, but these are not amendments which I would wish to press to a Division.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 14

AVAILABILITY OF CIVIL LEGAL AID

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 10, line 22, at end insert—

'(3) The Board shall establish a procedure under which any person whose application for legal aid under this section has been refused may apply to the Board for a review of his application.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 35.

Mr. MacKay: These amendments fulfil the undertaking that I gave at the start of the ninth sitting of the Standing Committee to provide on the face of the Bill for the establishment by the board of a review procedure in relation to refusals by the board of applications for legal aid for both civil cases and summary criminal cases.

I have phrased the amendment in the form of a review procedure because it seems better to have a review procedure involving reconsideration of the application as a whole, ab initio, rather than an appeals procedure based on what may be comparatively narrow objections to the original refusal. An appeals procedure could become over-formal and legalistic. It would be much more difficult for the person seeking legal aid—indeed he might need a lawyer to present his appeal—and might mean that new material produced by him could not be considered. Review, on the other hand, will leave the necessary freedom to reconsider all aspects of the application including any new material.

We discussed in Committee who might sit on a review committee. My amendment provides for the board to establish a procedure for review of refusals of applications and it will therefore be for the board to consider how best this can be done, although my right learned and hon. Friend the Secretary of State could make regulations if necessary.

I should explain that the board can establish committees which can consist either partly or wholly of members who are not members of the board. That power was included in the Bill with this appeal procedure arrangement very much in mind, both to ensure that an independent review was possible and because such review committees will no doubt consist mainly of lawyers and would thus not in practice consist mainly of board members. There would not be enough lawyers on the board to allow that to happen.

I do not wish to be too specific about how the committee will be formed and so on, because I shall incur the criticism of pre-empting the board's decisions, but I believe that the amendments honour my undertaking in Committee. I believe that they go all the way to satisfy the misgivings of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) and of Opposition Members.

Mr. Dewar: I welcome the amendments. I am glad that the Minister listened to the almost unanimous advice from both sides of the Committee and many interested outside organisations. There was widespread anxiety about the possibility of losing the present right of review of civil legal aid applications and an equally strong feeling that there was a gap in the present system.

Many hon. Members who had been approached by constituents who had been refused legal aid felt uncomfortable about the fact that there was no right of review. It is a positive strength of the new system that that right will exist in civil and criminal legal aid. It would be ungracious not to give a warm welcome to the Minister's comments. He put the case for his review, ab initio, very fairly. Goodness knows what Latin law is still to come! We shall watch as the evening unfolds.

It was useful to be reminded by the Minister that it is possible for the Scottish Legal Aid Board to form sub-committees that include people who are not members of the board. Presumably there is provision for paying the expenses and other outlays of such people.

Can the Minister assure us that the review procedure will be in place from the beginning?

Mr. Wallace: Ab initio.

Mr. Dewar: Yes, that springs to mind as a useful phrase on this occasion. Will there be a review procedure from the beginning? It is important that there should be, and I am sure that that is the intention.

The briefings from the Law Society have been useful throughout the passage of the Bill and the society says that it must withhold its final comment until it has had sight of the regulations, but I understand that there will be no regulations, because the amendment merely instructs the board to establish a procedure, which will be the business of the board.

There will be no question of regulations being laid or of scrutiny. Perhaps the Minister will confirm that fact and say whether there is an understanding that the scheme will be submitted to the Secretary of State. That is not an uncommon procedure, and I thought of tabling an amendment to have that done, but I was anxious not to delay matters and build in extra stages. Will there be a duty on the board to produce the plan within a set period and to make it public and satisfy the Secretary of State that it has carried out the legal duty that we shall lay upon it?

Mr. Fairbairn: I thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for putting on the face of the Bill the requirement to have a review procedure for legal aid in civil and summary criminal cases.

The Government have been sensitive and sensible in their reaction to criticism that came in comparative silence from the profession, but not entirely in silence from those of us who represent the interests of justice in the House.

Some matters worry me. First, one criticism made in Committee was that we were constantly writing blank cheques. We have written le plus blanc cheque because the Minister has written in the simple concept that the board will set up a procedure.

We are between two stools. The Secretary of State does not interfere with the board, but the Minister says that we do not know what it will do. We do not know whether it will be a dinosaur with four legs, or a kangaroo with two pouches. It is worrying that the Government say that they will set up the procedure, without the Minister explaining what form that procedure will take.

There are two forms of procedure. I understand that the Minister prefers the second form. The first form is that if a reason can be found for disallowing or refusing the first time, the review process can find that that is wrong. The second form is to have a replay, and no account is taken of the reason for refusal.

The Minister's view is that the second form is preferable, but if an original application merely goes into committee, it goes to an official. One does not know to which official it goes. It might go to Mr. Nice or to Mr. Nasty, who might be in a good mood or in a bad mood. If the review does not take into account the grounds on which the official decided against an application, that might be prejudicial—or very beneficial. The official's decision might be right and the review might miss the point. An applicant is entitled to know the grounds upon which a refusal is decided. That is basic natural justice.

If the Bill becomes law, the Secretary of State will set out a number of procedures. We shall be able to negative only in total any regulations applying the law. We shall be unable to alter them. I should like, as a matter of natural justice, to know why Mr. Unknown Official refused my application.

I see the Minister's argument. If three wise men judge a cause after one unknown man has judged it, a second chance should be given. But that is not the concept of justice in Scotland. In Scotland three wise men judge upon the judgment of the first person who judged the cause. That is a different concept. So I ask the Minister to consider carefully. We are considering going, not before courts or the Law Society, but before an official whose opinion or identity we shall never know. The name of the official and the reason for his judgment should be put before the appeal procedure. That is the minimum justice. He can consider that in addition to the concept of ordering a retrial, or a replay.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Is not the decision and the reason for it more important than the naming of the official?

Mr. Fairbairn: I am sure that it is, but it is the anonymity of the process that worries me. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand. One just does not know why a decision has been taken and one has no means of discovering who has taken it. I shall use the concept of the seven dwarves—Happy, Grumpy, Doc and so on. If one happens to get Grumpy, that might be the reason for the decision. That is not a good thing. Therefore, I feel that the review board should have before it a statement of fact. It can start again if it wishes, but it should at least know why the initial application was refused.

I am in no way criticising my hon. Friend the Minister. I hope that I am being helpful. I should like once again to congratulate him on the sensitivity with which he approached the anxieties put before him in Committee.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I should like to add my voice to the thanks which have been directed to the Minister. I am sure that he is in an unusual position and I trust that he is not over-embarrassed by it.

The hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) put his finger on one of the doubts that still exists and which was perhaps behind the somewhat cynical comment of the Law Society of Scotland that it would withhold final judgment until it saw the mysterious regulations. I think that we all accept that this is an improvement on the previous position, especially in relation to criminal legal aid, where there was no such appeal. That has been one of the aggravations that not only the legal profession, but those who have been refused legal aid have had to put up with.

I am concerned about another aspect. My concern is of a practical nature. The Minister has probably adopted this approach to reduce the amount of bureaucracy involved. It is easier not to give an explanation and for an official or group of officals to look again in the review procedure. When one has to frame reasons for a decision from a tribunal conscious thought has to be taken, especially in those proceedings which might end up in a higher court.

It would not necessarily follow, in relation to the refusal of a legal aid application, that a complex statement of reasons would have to be produced. It could almost be reduced to a code. However, it would help legal aid applicants and their advisers if they knew where their argument should be directed if they write in to support an application in the review procedure. Otherwise they are in the dark.

It may well be that the legal Aid Board official or the committee which has looked at the papers has a valid reason for refusing an application according to the information available. It could be that, if given additional information directed to the point at issue, the board or committee might well be satisfied of the usefulness of granting the certificate.

One of the features of the existing system which, in some ways, could be beneficial is the way in which decisions are taken by sheriffs or justices in chambers, I presume, on each application. Solicitors frequently turn up with the applicant, and the judge can direct questions to the applicant about the nature of the defence and so on. Therefore, if there is any doubt as to the reasons why legal aid should be granted or refused it can be made clear. Without the appeal procedure in criminal legal aid cases that might not necessarily provide a solution that would satisfy everybody. However, I think that it would be helpful if the Minister could outline what direction his mind is taking in relation to the system to be put into operation.

There is a practical matter which perhaps lay behind the original decision not to have a review, which is the increase in the volume of business. I have no doubt that a substantial number of appeals will be directed towards the Scottish Legal Aid Board that will require the time of staff or consultants under a fee-paying arrangement in considering them. Under the new centralised system which is in force, how much delay is likely to be encountered in dealing with the review cases? I was not a member of the Committee, but I understand that the Committee addressed itself to legal aid applications and dealing with them in a given time scale so that they would not get in the way of preparation of trails, especially in areas where trails take place fairly swiftly. If there is a review procedure, it will be necessary for the board to receive an answer quickly so that the necessary work in preparing a defence can proceed. I think that the House would find it of substantial interest if the Minister could lighten our darkness.

Mr. Wallace: I join those who have expressed appreciation to the Minister for deciding to introduce amendments that will allow a review procedure in both civil and criminal legal aid. Many of us still have misgivings about the Bill as a whole, but if the amendments are carried it will emerge from the House as a better measure.

The Minister should take on board the valid points made by the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). The person who has his application refused should be told in what way it was defective and did not match what was required for him to be awarded legal aid. I can understand the Minister's reluctance to say too much lest it be thought that he is speaking for the board, setting out what it should do and being unnecessarily interfering. If the Minister expressed a view, I am sure that the board would have regard to it, as it will to those who have said what the board should do in setting up the procedure. If it includes in its procedures the giving of an indication to the applicant why, in a general area, his appeal was unsuccessful, the applicant and his advisers will be able to provide more information. The indication might signify that there was a misunderstanding, which the applicant might be able to clarify.

If there is an internal mechanism and a file, to which papers are attached, the file will be passed on under the review procedure to three of four wise men or women. It is not impossible that the reason why the official of first instance thought that the application should be refused will be set out on a document within the file. The applicant may not know why he has been refused and it would not be impossible for the reason for the refusal to be made known to the appeal procedure as a whole. It would be unfair if it were put into minds of the wise men or women why the decision to refuse the application had been made at first instance, especially if the applicant had not had an opportunity to furnish more information.

Mr. Fairbairn: That would be the ultimate of unfairness. When I considered the alternatives I said to myself, "You might lessen the chances of the appeal board granting the appeal if you told it why the application had been refused in the first place." That is one possibility. That might restrict the way in which the board would consider the appeal. It would be heinous if the board were able to tip the wink to the appeal procedure why the original decision was made and the applicant was not informed. The board would then be able to produce an entirely different reason for refusing the appeal.

Mr. Wallace: I completely share the fears expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross. I hope that the points that have been made in this debate are considered by the board when it sets up the review procedures so that such infairness as have been mentioned can be excluded and such positive means which might enhance the fairness of the review procedure might be included. In conclusion, I welcome the fact that a review procedure is to be set up.

Mr. John MacKay: Clearly the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) was listening to me during the Committee stage when he suggested that I might say that I am not running the board. I do not wish to go into detailed prescriptions as to how the board might set up the procedure.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister has always said that.

Mr. MacKay: I have not said that this evening.

Mr. Wallace: Yes, the Minister has.

Mr. MacKay: Oh dear. Well, the more I say it the more I might be believed on this subject because some people think that the board is to be entirely the creature of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I am trying to explain that that will not be the case.

In response to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), I can state that the appeal procedure will be in situ when the new system gets under way. The power to appoint to the sub-committee comes in paragraph 12(3) of schedule 1. The hon. Member for Garscadden also asked what role my right hon. and learned Friend might have in ensuring that the board does what we have said that it ought to. There is the possibility under clause 36(2)(a) of making regulations about these matters. Whether we proceed by regulations or not is a matter which will be discussed by the board and my right hon. and learned Friend. There will be discussions between the board and the Scottish Office with regard to the appeal procedure.

Mr. Dewar: I understand that there will be discussions, but I am sure that the Minister's views will be very persuasive to the board. Do I take it that the Minister favours the possibility of regulations being laid in dealing with the review procedure? That would be useful to know because it would tell us a little about the possibility of influencing the form and style of the procedure.

Mr. MacKay: I can understand the hon. Gentleman's point. However, the question whether this will need to be carried out through regulations or by the board setting up the procedures under its powers is a matter upon which I am broadly neutral at present. I can see the force of regulations because they would give the House the opportunity of having its say. However, I hope that the hon. Member for Garscadden can be content with fact that I have listened to the various points that have been made in this short debate and when the board discusses this matter it will also examine the points made by hon. Members who have contributed to the Committee and the Report stages.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) posed a difficult question about the nature of the procedure. He asked whether it should be a review procedure or—if I may describe it in this way—a legal-type appeal in which the reasons for the decision must be given. The present position on civil matters is that in an appeal the committee handling the appeal cannot take new factors into account. I have made it clear that when someone appeals to the board under the new procedure, I envisage that that person would be able to include anything new that he wanted to draw to the review committee's attention. When an application is refused on grounds of the interests of justice, that is exactly what the person will be told, just as at present. It will not be possible for the board to go into great detail as its decision involves a balancing of the various factors.

Nor would it be practicable to name an official, partly because several officials may be involved and especially because the decision will be taken in the name of the board, not in the name of one official.

Mr. Fairbairn: I am not happy with this at all. The interests of justice are not defined, but the matters to be taken into account are adumbrated in the Bill. It would be ludicrous if a person was to appeal imagining that the ground upon which he had been refused was that his defence was frivolous, when in fact the ground upon which the matter had been refused was one of the others. He must be told, if he is to be allowed to give additional facts, which wing is missing or the ground on which he has failed. For example, it would be ridiculous if, in a French examination, a child thought that he had failed because he did not understand the plays of Moliere when in fact he had failed because he did not know how to decline the verb "aimer"—je t'aime, tu l'aime, and so on. He must be given some idea of the ground upon which he can improve.

Mr. MacKay: My hon. and learned Friend's argument holds together only if one considers an appeal-type system. With such a system, the appeal committee would need to know the grounds upon on which the application had been refused. But if we have a review procedure, with the committee considering the case completely anew and not taking into account whether the initial decision was rightly based, it is a different matter. Indeed, we should insert in the system a fairness—a second look—which does not involve the original decider or deciders arguing their case in front of the review committee and, presumably, the applicant arguing his case again. It would be unfair if one side could defend its case in person or on paper while the other side could not do likewise. Although my hon. and learned Friend's point would be valid in an appeal-type system, it would not have so much strength in a review system.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland said that it is conceivable that, when the file reached the review committee, it would contain some scribbled notes which would tell the committee why the person or persons involved had turned down the application. That is a fair point. The board will have to ensure that its people do not make notes on the face of a file which might later go to a review committee.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): That is ridiculous.

Mr. MacKay: The hon. Gentleman says that that is ridiculous, but he has not been listening to the argument. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland made the valid point that if there is to be a review ab initio, the papers should not contain remarks made by the decider showing the committee how he arrived at his conclusion. That would be wrong, so the board must take steps to ensure that its people do not write on the face of files that might come before the review committee.

Mr. Fairbairn: That would be absolutely outrageous, because if the decider was Mr. Grumpy from among my gnomes, he need not give a reason. He need only say, "Never liked the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay); refuse." He would be prevented from giving any reason because someone else might read it. Therefore, he can refuse the application without giving a reason, which would be outrageous. Let us look at the Bill. This would be absurd. In the context of legal aid in clause 24, official No. 1 who is not Grumpy, but an honourable gentleman, might say that in his opinion the offence is such that if proved it is unlikely that the court would impose a sentence which would deprive the accused of his liberty. So he comes to that conclusion. It does not matter if he consults 200 others, but that is the reason why he refuses legal aid. Along comes the review committee, which is not allowed to consider that matter because this guy is not allowed to write down lest it prejudice the review committee, and says that in its opinion, the defence to be advanced by the accused appears to be frivolous. That is not a review. One cannot have one official coming to a conclusion that is not subject to test by those who are reviewing it and who come for a totally different reason to the same decision, which is a refusal. That is not a review. It is not even justice.

Mr. MacKay: I am well aware that I shall not convince my hon. and learned Friend about this matter. I have given it some thought since he raised it in Committee. We spoke about it as well after the end of the Committee stage.

I understand my hon. and learned Friend's point, but those are factors that have to be taken into account. There could be other factors in a particular case that the officials might take into account. It is better that we have a review procedure. A review procedure without the official or officials who made the original decision having any influence on the review committee is a perfectly fair and reasonable way to proceed. I understand that my hon. and learned Friend would like to do it in a more legalistic way, dare I say, as if it were an appeal court, but there are other circumstances, not perhaps in the law, where appeals are taken as reviews by another body, which looks independently and separately from the original body, or decision-makers, at the subject under appeal.

That is the fairest way. I think that it is likely to be the quickest way of dealing with the problem, rather than hearing arguments and allowing them to carry on between the original officers who made the decision and the applicant, or indeed the applicant's lawyer. For example, if the person who made the original decision is a lawyer, and he argues in front of the review committee why his decision should stand, the poor old applicant should have a lawyer defending his corner. Before we know where we are, we shall add great complications to what should be a simple and fair issue of a straightforward review by new and independent people, afresh.

Mr. Wallace: Much of the debate has taken place on the basis of a refusal of criminal legal aid in summary cases, where the interests of justice come into play.

However, one could be considering the refusal of civil legal aid, because in the view of the official who deals with it first, there is no probabilis causa litigandi. That might involve important matters of legal consideration. I recall one case in which I was involved, about the granting of legal aid for an appeal to the House of Lords. It may have been legalistic, but a legal point was there to be argued. It was thought by some that there was probabilis causa. In such a case there is some advantage of knowing exactly what the barrier is to the granting of legal aid.

Mr. MacKay: I understand that point, but equally I must point out that the composition of the review committee will be heavily weighted in favour of lawyers, dare I say it, at the risk of being thought to be setting up a body composed of lawyers. The committee will be largely composed of lawyers, a bit like the House at this stage of the evening. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that, in the case of civil legal aid, there may be considerable legal matters to be considered by the review body, I should have thought that the type of review body that I envisage would be well qualified to consider the matters that will be brought to its attention by the applicant.

I know that I have not convinced my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross, but I hope that the fact that I have conceded the argument about having a review or appeal in civil and criminal cases will find merit in the House and that the House in general will agree that we are served better with a review procedure than with the type of appeal procedure which my hon. and learned Friend has argued in favour of fairly persuasively and often.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 19

Expenses out of the Fund

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move, amendment No. 8, in page 13, leave out lines 1 to 5.

Clause 19 concerns the circumstances in which a court may make an award out of the legal aid fund to an unassisted party to defray, in whole or in part, expenses incurred when the other party to the action has been legally aided. One of the preconditions is that the unassisted party would be entitled to expenses against the legally assisted person in any event.

The Bill provides, in clause 19 (3)(b):

"in the case of expenses of proceedings in a court of first instance, those proceedings were instituted by the legally assisted person, and the court is satisfied that the unassisted party will suffer severe financial hardship unless the order is made".

That provision is what the amendment would exclude.

The argument falls into two parts. The first relates to the basic unfairness of the unassisted party being in a relatively advantageous position if proceedings are instituted by someone on legal aid but having no right to have expenses awarded to him out of the fund if he raised the proceedings and they were defended by someone on legal aid when it is unlikely that there would have been any action or defence, if legal aid had not been made available to the defendant. If the unassisted party receives assistance out of the fund, it seems only fair that he should do so if he is a pursuer or a defender.

This matter was raised in another place by Lord Denning, which is perhaps not a name that brings music to Minister's ears. One of the cases that he cited to the other place was an English one — Mr. Thews v. Mr Reeves—which was reported in the 1982 Queen's Bench Division reports. It was a simple case. Mr. Thews had built up a business and agreed to sell it to Mr. Reeves for £50,000 — £5,000 to be paid immediately and regular instalments of £800 to follow. The £5,000 was paid, but there was default on the instalments. Mr. Thews raised a straightforward action for payment.

The action was defended — the commission of some fraud was put forward as the defence. The claim was found to be spurious, but the defendant was given legal aid to pursue that defence. The defence was thrown out, but because the case was instituted by a non-assisted party and it was dealt with at first instance, there was no way in which the court, although it thought that the plaintiff should be awarded out of the fund, could make such an award because the matter had been brought by an unassisted party. It is to get away from that basic unfairness that I propose this amendment. Indeed, paragraph 243 of the report of the Lord Chancellor's Advisory Committee stated:

"We continue to support broadening the provisions of the Act to permit successful plaintiffs to receive costs from the fund".

That is an English advisory committee, but in a case such as this the basic fairness also applies in Scotland.

11.30 pm

The clause also states that the unassisted party will have to suffer financial hardship before the order is made. That in itself goes too far. Subsection (c) allows the court to make an award if it is felt to be "just and equitable in all the circumstances".

That is the proper test. The criterion of the unassisted party suffering severe financial hardship is unduly restrictive. Anomalies can arise. A case could go through the Inner House of the Court of Session to the House of Lords, which may feel that some payment should have been made from public funds to the unassisted person. The House of Lords could award expenses for proceedings in the House of Lords, but could not do so in respect of the expenses at first instance because of this clause. That could also lead to anomalies.

Here we have an opportunity to make a constructive change in the law that will lead to a fairer system. On two occasions in recent months constituents have told me that they have been the unassisted parties in litigation and have been unsuccessful in obtaining expenses. It can cost people a lot of money, either to pursue their right or to defend it. There is a feeling that if one party is in receipt of legal aid, in some respects that party can hold the other party to ransom. Such a party knows that he has nothing to lose if the action continues to run, whereas the unassisted person, however right his cause, must look over his shoulder at the mounting expenses. Indeed, it could get to the ludicrous position where it is costing a person more to defend his right than it would be if he accepted the case brought against him.

For these reasons, I move the amendment. It will introduce greater equity into the law on legal aid, particularly in relation to unassisted parties.

Mr. John MacKay: The circumstances in which a non-legally-aided litigant who is successful against a legally-aided party can obtain payment on his expenses from the legal aid fund are limited, and always have been, since the possibility of such payment was introduced in 1964.

[Mr. John MacKay]

The amendment would remove some of these limitations, in particular those which relate to the expenses of first instance proceedings. Succesive Governments have taken the view that where an unassisted person has been brought into court not of his own will, but to defend an action against him raised by an assisted person, then he should be able, if successful, to obtain his expenses from the fund — if otherwise eligible. This seems only fair, since in assisting the pursuer from the fund the board would have taken the view that the pursuer had probabilis causa litigandi — that is, a reasonable prospect of success. If it accepted its share of the responsibility for instituting the action, it should accept liability. However, the position is rather different if the unassisted party instituted proceedings, since then he must take responsibility for the risks of proceeding. Given the continuing need to make the best possible use of resources available for legal aid, I continue to think it is proper to distinguish the two cases.

The amendment would also abolish the provision that an unassisted person's expenses would be met only if he would otherwise suffer severe financial hardship. While I have some sympathy for the position of many unassisted parties, again I do not think the resources of the legal aid fund should be available in cases where there is no real financial need. I hope that with that explanation, the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Wallace: I am not convinced by what the Minister said. There is a basic question of equity at stake. The Minister said that an unassisted party which is a defender is entitled in some circumstances to have his expenses covered by the fund, but that if, through obtaining legal help, he incurs considerable expense to pursue his right and does so successfully, he is not entitled to claim expenses from the fund. That seems inequitable and I am not convinced by the Minister's explanation that in some way it is equitable.

Clause 21

SCOPE AND NATURE OF CRIMINAL LEGAL AID

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 14, line 43, leave out from 'held' to 'in' in line 1 on page 15.

The amendment deals with criminal legal aid. Clause 21(4)(b) states:

"Criminal legal aid shall consist of representation, in terms provided for by this Act — . . . by a solicitor at any identification parade held, by or on behalf of the prosecutor within the meaning of section 462 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975."

Since 1980 it has been possible to hold identification parades at the instance of the defence. The simple purpose of the amendment is to allow criminal legal aid to cover those parades as well as parades at the instance of the prosecutor. I do not think that that occurs in many cases, but, as I understand it, criminal legal aid would not be available if an identification parade were held at the instance of the defence, although the person had legal representation. The amendment provides a certain degree of equity in that regard.

Mr. John MacKay: The hon. Gentleman has explained the purpose of the amendment, which is to make sure that automatic legal aid will be available for identification parades which are held at the request of the suspected or accused person, rather than at the instigation of the Crown.

I am happy to assure the hon. Gentleman that the amendment is unnecessary. That is because, as he will see from section 10 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980, which originally added this provision to the legal aid legislation, the strict position is that all identification parades are held by or on behalf of the prosecutor. That is so whether the identification parade follows a decision by the prosecutor or by the police, who are taken to be acting on behalf of the prosecutor, that one is needed; or a request for one by the accused; or, indeed, is held in consequence of an order made by the sheriff under section 10 of the 1980 Act. The advantage of the present wording is that it fits in with that of section 10, and I should have thought that that was helpful.

With that assurance, which I hope the hon. Gentleman will find more comforting this time, I hope he will feel able to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Wallace: I am only too pleased on the strength of that assurance to beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 24

LEGAL AID IN SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 16, line 28, after 'Act', insert

', to section 21(3) of this Act'.

This amendment is consequential on the insertion in Committee of clause 21(3).

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 17, line 4, after 'offence', insert

'taking into account the surrounding circumstances (including any previous convictions or any other findings of guilt) against the accused'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 15, in page 17, line 6, at end insert

'or impair his prospects of future employment'.

No. 16, in page 17, line 6, at end insert

'or impairment of his employment prospects'.

Government No. 28.

No. 29, in page 17, line 18, after 'but', insert

'except insofar as provided by paragraph (a) of this subsection'.

No. 30, in page 17, line 19, at end insert

'except when considering an application under subsection 3 (a) above'.

Mr. Wallace: These are important amendments. They relate to the factors that we took into account in determining whether it was in the interests of justice that criminal legal aid should be made available in any case. Right hon. and hon. Members will recall that when the consultation paper that was the forerunner to the Bill was produced there was an indication in it that one of the factors that might be taken into account in determining the interests of justice was whether the accused person had a criminal record. That met with widespread criticism. It was felt by many, myself included, that it struck at the heart of our system, which is that a person should be regarded as innocent until proved guilty. On Second Reading the Minister properly pointed out that it would not be the Government's intention to include such a factor in those that they would put forward as relevant when assessing the interests of justice. The Government did that when they eventually tabled their amendment setting the factors, and that appears in lines 18 and 19 of the clause.

It became clear during the debate in Committee that any previous conviction or other findings of guilt could be relevant in considering whether the court would be likely to impose a sentence that would deprive a person of his liberty or lead to the loss of a person's livelihood. Clearly a first offence would not necessarily lead to a prison sentence, but if it were a person's fourth or fifth offence, that could lead to a prison sentence. That could be highly relevant in determining whether a person was likely to lose his liberty or livelihood. For that purpose, it was thought that a person's previous convictions should be taken into account.

Linked with amendment No. 14 is amendment No. 29, which would qualify lines 18 and 19 to the extent that the passage would read:

"except insofar as provided by paragraph (a) of this subsection the Board shall not take account of any previous convictions" —that is, for the purposes of determining whether it is likely that the court will impose a prison sentence or a substantial fine leading to the loss of a person's livelihood."

Unfortunately, the Government's response to the criticisms that were made in Committee about Government amendment No. 28 has been to delete lines 18 and 19 together. That is a regrettable deletion, after the Minister had given us an assurance on Second Reading that previous convictions would not be taken into account by the board in determining whether it was in the interests of justice that criminal legal aid be made available.

The amendments proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and myself, or that tabled by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), which has the same effect, meet the point made in Committee. They allow the board to have regard to previous convictions when considering subsection (a), but will not allow it to do so generally when assessing whether it is in the interests of justice that criminal legal aid should be granted. These amendments encapsulated the mood of the Committee although they criticised the provision, it was never the intention of members that the requirement not to have regard to previous convictions should be entirely deleted. I ask the Minister seriously to consider these points.

The other amendments add that apart from a sentence leading to the loss of livelihood, it might also impair a person's employment prospects. That concern was aired in Committee. If a person is fortunate enough to be in employment, a court sentence might affect his livelihood. Equally, those who are unemployed might find that their employment prospects are impaired, perhaps irreparably, or damaged by the imposition of a prison sentence or even a substantial fine. The Committee felt that it was just as important to protect their rights as the rights of those who are fortunate enough to have jobs.

I hope that the Minister will look sympathetically at the amendment. It is not intended to be a wrecking amendment. It takes account of the interests of those who are unemployed and who might find that their prospects of obtaining employment are seriously harmed if a sentence of imprisonment is imposed upon them after having had no legal representation at their trial.

Mr. Dewar: I agree with the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) that this is an important group of amendments that raise a number of interesting issues. They plunge us straight into an argument about a clause that tries to define the interests of justice. The amendments go to the heart of many of the problems relating to the Bill. I enjoy the inestimable advantage of not having been involved in the Committee debates. I do not know whether that means that I come to a consideration of the Bill with an uncluttered mind, but that does not prevent me from approaching the argument with some fairly firm opinions.

One of the problems about defining the interests of justice — a controversial concept that many hon. Members thought that it would be better not to pursue —is that the Minister finds that having listed a number of factors that have to be taken into account—and it is by no means an exhaustive list—he now has to invite those hon. Members who are interested in the subject to consider what should be added to them. By doing so, he lays himself open to attempts to improve upon the draftsmanship.

I support what has just been said by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland about amendments Nos. 15 and 16. Both of them strike at exactly the same point, although the wording is slightly different. In both cases the wording is perfectly satisfactory, although obviously I prefer my own: to add at the end of the subsection the words

However, I should not take umbrage if the Minister preferred amendment No. 16. Both amendments are self-explanatory, and it is not for me to labour the point.

The Bill fairly lays down that one of the points to be included in this core collection of factors is the likelihood of conviction leading to the loss of livelihood. None of us would quarrel with that conclusion. The trouble is that in the brave new world in which we live—certainly the world that has evolved during the last six or seven years —the number of people in Scotland for whom the loss of livelihood is an academic concept has increased to shameful proportions.

The amendments say that there should be another consideration—the impairment of the applicant's future employment prospects. That seems to be particularly important. I had hoped that atht concept would commend itself to the Minister. He may say that if there is such a special factor, the board can take it into account in the case of that application. But there is some merit in covering the position of the unemployed. For example, a man might have interviews pending. It would be extremely difficult to go to them with any hope if he had a recent conviction against his name. Obviously, legal representation might be enormously important in putting a proper defence.

Anyone applying for a job with a conviction is likely to be ruled out. It would be an extremely good way of winnowing through the enormous list of applicants for any job vacancy in Scotland. That applicant's chances might be devasted until he is rescued by the terms of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act, and his conviction is spent. I need not urge on the Minister the significance of a conviction for someone searching for a job. If he is guilty and has been convicted, that is the end of the matter, but it would be a tragedy if he had not been represented and if a genuine defence had not been properly stated, because he might then find himself ruled out of the job market.

The amendments are straightforward and make the case. I do not see why the Minister should not show us his new-found virtue. As yet, I am not quiet convinced that he is sensitive. That is not an adjective that would occur to me when contemplating his activities. Several epithets come to mind, but I shall not spoil the atmosphere by dwelling on them. But the Secretary of State, with his Shogun and Rambo images, which his press officer is so assiduously cultivating, is probably aware that the Minister is capable of putting on verbal bovver boots with the rest, so "sensitive" does seem a little incongruous. But I should be happy if he lived up to that reputation, and I hope that the Minister will look kindly upon these amendments.

I warned the Committee that the later groups of amendments were the most important, and I now wish to mention the significant matters represented by them. In Committee, there was an interesting debate about lines 18 and 19, which the Government propose to take out with amendment No. 28. They say that the "Board shall not take account of any previous convictions or other findings of guilt against the accused."

I accept that there was a genuine problem, and the Minister and the Committee had to wrestle with an apparent clash between the survival of those lines, and the very proper terms of subsection 3(a), where the board would have to take into account the possibility of loss of liberty. In assessing loss of liberty, the client's previous record might well prove important.

There was an argument about that incompatibility, and a good deal of dispute about the best way of proceeding. Perhaps I should give my hostage to fortune right away, in that during the course of that debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) impetuously—he is, on occasion, impetuous—suggested tersely to the Minister that the answer was to, "Take it out." That appears in column 292 of the Committee's proceedings, and excise was the message. The Minister might well argue that he has done just that, and might question what we are complaining about. But I do not need to remind him of his reaction to that concise suggestion. He said:

"No, I will not take it out, but I shall think about how I might get around it". — [Official Report, First Scottish Standing Committee, 1 July 1986; c. 292.]

I offer those examples of the Minister's prose strictly in the context in which they were uttered, which was on this very point.

Therefore, we had a firm commitment from the Minister that he did not want to take out lines 18 and 19 and the reference to the fact that no account was to be taken of previous convictions. He specifically committed himself to finding a way round the difficulty.

I am sorry that he did not keep to that intention. His thoughts on that occasion were the best thoughts and I regret that amendment No. 28 is now on the Order Paper. It is of some importance that the general statement of principle about disregarding previous convictions should remain as part of the Bill and that some other way should be found of overcoming any ambiguity or inconsistency between that and the terms of subsection 3(a).

I say that because one of the foundation arguments that was used in Committee was that the Royal Commission said:

"Accordingly, the grant of legal aid should not depend on the accused person's criminal record."

That was common ground among all parties and clearly it was important to put that on the record, particularly —I say this with no malice—because there has been a suggestion in the original consultative paper, which I think was something of an Aunt Sally, put up to be shot down, that the number of occasions on which an accused had applied for legal aid in the past might be a consideration in whether his most recent application should be granted.

We had that background of doubt and against it it is important that the general point about previous convictions should stand in the Bill. It is on that basis that I argue strongly against amendment No. 28 in the Minister's name. I notice that the Law Society in its briefing for the debate described that amendment as "hastily conceived, wrongly inserted and ill serves the spirit of the clause within the Bill".

I endorse that view.

I hope that I have reasonably clearly set out the arguments. I am suggesting that we should go back to the Minister mark 1—the Minister who was apparently in charge in Committee until someone got at him at a later stage. We invite him to consider a version of amendment No. 29, or amendment No. 30 in my name, on the basis that they carry out the spirit of his commitment not to excise lines 18 and 19 but to find a way round the difficulties to which I have referred.

The proposition that we should leave in

"but the Board shall not take account of any previous convictions or any other findings of guilt against the accused."

and add to that the words

is a simple straightforward and effective way of meeting the difficulty and still preserving the general point about not taking account of previous convictions, which I think commended itself to both sides of the Committee.

I do not think that there is a matter of principle between myself and the Minister. I hope that there is not. It is a matter of how we achieve a neat and workable clause. The best way, without sacrificing something of importance, which the Minister's formula does, is to retain the reference and add the important exception in favour of considerations of applications under subsection 3(a), which is done by my amendment.

This is an important matter. I do not argue it to hold the Committee for a few minutes late at night. I feel strongly about it. I know that I am supported in that feeling by many hon. Members and people with an interest outside and I am comforted in my argument by the Minister's observations in Committee which I believe were good.

Mr. Fairbairn: I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's view and I think that the Government's amendment will achieve the reverse of its intention. However, how would the official ever come to a conclusion about whether a prison sentence was likely to result from a conviction unless he considered the person's previous record? If he said, "This offence only involves throwing a stone at a pigeon," he would have to add, "But let us see what this person has been doing previously." It seems to me that in almost all cases a person's record would have to be considered.

Mr. Dewar: I understand what the hon. and learned Gentleman is saying and I do not think that there is anything between us. It would be possible to argue that the retention of the general point about not taking account of previous convictions is struck at by the implication in subsection (3)(a) that in the consideration of the likelihood of a prison sentence a person's previous record will have to be weighed in the balance.

The important distinction is that my amendment would make it clear that an exception to the general rule about not taking previous convictions into account when deciding whether legal aid should be granted would be a narrow exception that was entirely related to the consideration of the likely loss of liberty and that, in general terms, when applying other criteria or when taking an overall view of the interests of justice, the official, the solicitor, the committee or whoever, would have to put that information from their minds.

It may be said that that distinction is artificial and that once that fact was before the committee its members could not put it from their minds, but we often ask members of juries to put facts from their minds and we do not think that that strikes at the nature of the system. There are many legal occasions when men of legal training and skill have to put facts to one side when considering a decision. I hope that it will not be beyond the discipline of the board to go through the same process.

I should like to preserve the general reference to the importance of disregarding previous convictions and make them relevant only in the narrowly defined exceptions set out in my amendments and those of Liberal Members. I certainly prefer that to the Minister's solution, which is the easy way out of merely excising the reference to the general principle.

I urge the Minister to look at the matter sympathetically. It is an issue of substance and I hope that he will give a positive reply.

Mr. John MacKay: I underline what the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said at the beginning of his speech. The list that we are considering is not exhaustive and cannot be a definition. We are not defining the interests of justice, but are setting out factors to be taken into account. The words "shall include" are clearly on the face of the Bill.

When we discussed the concept in Committee on 1 July I gave an undertaking to look again at my amendments to clause 24 setting out those factors, and Government amendment No. 28 responds to the disquiet expressed in Committee about the interaction between the interests of justice factor in subsection (3)(a), which refers to the likelihood of an accused person losing his liberty or livelihood on conviction, and the tailpiece to subsection (3) which says that previous convictions or findings of guilt are not to be taken into account.

My amendment deletes the requirement that the board shall not take account of an applicant's previous conviction or convictions or any other finding of guilt against him. The tailpiece was in line with the recommendations in paragraph 8.55 of the report of the Royal Commission on Legal Services in Scotland and also took account of strongly expressed response to my Department's consultation paper that previous convictions should not be taken into consideration in the awarding of criminal legal aid. I listened carefully to the argument — and I understand it — that those with previous convictions are more likely to go to gaol and that such accused should be allowed to refer to their previous convictions in support of an application for criminal legal aid, but only if they wish to mention them. The amendment leaves the options open by deleting the tailpiece. An accused will, no doubt, be advised by his lawyer whether it is likely to be in his interests to draw the board's attention to the existence of previous convictions. It remains clear that the mere fact of a previous conviction is not put forward as a factor for the board's consideration.

Mr. Dewar: This is interesting, but alarming. The Minister seems to be saying that the applicant and his solicitor must weigh up the pros and cons of mentioning previous convictions. They can mention them and so strengthen the possibility of getting legal aid and because liberty is at risk, or not mention them on the ground that it would prejudice the legal aid board's view. I do not like that implication.

If that is the Minister's view it is important that it is in the Bill. I do not want that unfortunate Hobson's choice to be presented to the defence. The White Paper made us fear that previous convictions might become a factor in whether an accused is allowed legal aid. My point reinforces strongly the good sense of approaching the problem in the way that Opposition Members suggest.

Mr. MacKay: I see the hon. Gentleman's point, just as I saw the point of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) in Committee. Perhaps I was in error in deciding to accede to the hon. Gentleman's request. I resisted the argument for a long time.

I shall try to explain. The lawyer must decide whether previous convictions are relevant to the offence before the court. Previous convictions might be quite different. A motoring offence might be being considered and the previous convictions might be under the freshwater fisheries legislation. The lawyer might decide that previous convictions are irrelevant and do not influence the court when imposing a sentence. But that balance might change when the court takes previous convictions into account. The lawyer makes the judgment.

Mr. Fairbairn: The applicant might not be advised by a lawyer and the lawyer will be in a dilemma if the applicant has a previous conviction for culpable homicide and is charged with careless driving or breach of the peace. Will he mention the previous conviction or keep it quiet? The essential principle is that legal aid should not be refused on the basis of a chap being a criminal before and therefore likely to be guilty on another occasion. That has nothing to do with whether he is likely to be imprisoned for a contravention of the litter legislation, or of whatever other minor offence he might be accused. I beg my hon. Friend the Minister to reconsider the issue that the board shall not take account of "any previous convictions or any other findings of guilt"

against the accused in its determination of whether he should get legal aid. That is the point. He must be regarded as innocent when the final decision is made.

Mr. MacKay: I see the argument, but I wish that hon. Members had not put an argument the other way round in Committee.

Mr. Dewar: They did not.

Mr. MacKay: Oh yes they did. I was there. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) was not. I can tell him.

Clause 24(3), as modified by amendment No. 28, achieves the purpose of amendment No. 14 and, as I understand it, what hon. Members wish to achieve. Under subsection 3*(a)* as it stands, the board, in considering the likelihood of a custodial sentence, will be both entitled and obliged to take into account, apart from previous convictions, all the circumstances of the offence and of the accused himself—anything which a court, if he is found guilty, will take into consideration in sentencing him. We all agree on that. Amendment No. 28 further ensures that the board is able to take the accused's previous record into account, as was pointed out in Committee, because previous convictions may be very relevant to the likelihood of a custodial sentence on this occasion. Nobody disagrees with that as I understand it.

Mr. Wallace: I do not think that there is much that separates us on this issue. My amendment, and the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) makes previous convictions relevant, solely for the purposes of subsection 3*(a)*. In other words it acts in a positive way to ensure that a person gets legal aid. By retaining lines 18 and 19 at the same time we wish to ensure that the knowledge of previous convictions cannot act in a negative way. By accepting either my amendment or that of the hon. Member for Garscadden that purpose is achieved. It allows previous convictions to be taken into account for the purposes of considering whether a sentence is likely to be one of imprisonment, in other words to enhance a person's chances of getting legal aid, but makes it clear that the previous convictions are to have no other sway on the board and are certainly not to have any negative influence in determining whether legal aid should be granted.

Mr. MacKay: The fact that my amendment takes out the tailpiece does not mean that the board shall take into account previous convictions in the way that hon. Members seem to fear. The fears being expressed that the board might refuse legal aid because a person has previous convictions are thoroughly misplaced. I have not said that. In Committee I was persuaded that there was a danger in the way in which the Bill was worded. I am satisfied that Government amendment No. 28 meets the concerns that were expressed on that occasion and does not take us into the concerns that are being expressed tonight. The only circumstances in which the board has to take account of previous convictions are the ones I have outlined.

Mr. Dewar rose——

Mr. MacKay: I made the point earlier that there is no obligation on anyone to inform the board of his or her previous convictions. That was a fear expressed on a previous occasion in response to a discussion document earlier. The board will not have a record of anybody's previous convictions unless the person involved feels that it is relevant to 3*(a)* and to the likelihood of being sent to prison if found guilty of the offence.

12.15 am

Mr. Dewar: To some extent, the Minister has made difficulties for himself. If he is right in saying that there is no reason for fearing that previous convictions will colour the board's approach to the general proposition that legal aid should be granted in a particular case, why did he raise the issue of the difficult choice of whether to let the board know about previous convictions? That fear was specifically in the Minister's mind when he suggested that someone might be well advised not to rely on subsection (3)(a) and instead to hide the fact that there are previous convictions. The Minister cannot get out of that difficulty. This underlines that he was right in Committee to say that it was necessary to find another way of reconciling the general prohibition on considering previous convictions and the specific circumstances outlined in subsection (3)(a). The Minister has not told us why he has changed his mind. He has not explained to me why my fears are spurious given the arguments that he has been advancing.

Mr. MacKay: I have changed my mind on listening to the discussion that took place in Committee and thinking about it afterwards. I took on board the simple argument that in some circumstances the fact that an accused has a previous conviction may have a major bearing on the danger of him being sent to prison if he is found guilty. That seems perfectly clear. I decided that the easiest way to respond to that justifiable fear was to remove lines 18 and 19. It appears that hon. Members are frightened that that will lead to the other extreme, and I have made it as clear as I can that it does not. That could be envisaged only if an applicant were obliged to tell the board what his previous convictions were. The applicant will tell the board about his previous convictions only if he and his lawyer—I accept that there will not always be a lawyer —think that that is something that the board should take into account when it is judging whether he may be sent to prison if he is found guilty.

Mr. Maxton: The Minister seems to be being especially obtuse on this issue. We all agree that the words in question in subsection (3)(a) should not be taken into account. Paragraph (e) reads:

"the defence to be advanced by the accused does not appear to be frivolous."

In that circumstance one can think of cases where it would be wrong for the board to take account of previous convictions. The accused might have said on three occasions in the past, "No, it wasn't me. I have an alibi", and the court has said, "You have not. We do not agree with you." If the accused claims for the fourth time that he has an alibi, the board might say, "He is saying it again and it is a frivolous defence." Of course, the fourth time might be the time when there is an alibi. The Minister is right to take account of subsection (3)(a), which we are asking him to do, but what about the other four paragraphs? That is why we think that the amendment should be limited to paragraph (a).

Mr. MacKay: I have made it as clear as I can why it is my view and that of my advisers that the danger which is being exposed by hon. Members does not exist and that the concession that I am making to the request made to me in Committee meets the objective put to me by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) and others. I understood the objective and took it on board, and I have met it without exposing the applicant to the danger which are being rehearsed.

Mr. Fairbairn: With great respect to my hon. Friend the Minister, I caution him on this matter. I do not think that this was a discussion in which I was a protagonist—

Mr. Maxton: Are you sure?

Mr. Fairbairn: I am not sure about that and I am willing to be corrected. It is important that we establish the principle and leave in the words

"the Board shall not take account of any previous convictions or other findings of guilt against the accused."

It is not a question of whether one's lawyer cares to advance the matter. These matters are frequently notorious. It was part of the argument in the Meehan case that the defendant was guilty because he had given the explanation of picking up people in the north of Scotland when he broke into a petrol station. He was convicted of that and because he gave the same explanation again — which was notorious and would undoubtedly be known to the legal board—he must be guilty. That explanation was even drawn into the Hunter report.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will understand that it is absolutely essential that that should be excluded as a concept in principle. It is matter of argument whether that should be dealt with in 3(a). I would be surprised if the board relied on the information that it received to decide on the matter, rather than deciding on the basis of the information already known to it.

This is important. The lines in the Bill to which the amendment relate, simply state that the presumption of innocence should be presumed. The Government would not be getting into trouble if they accepted—or at any rate agreed to consider—the points made by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and reconsidered the matter. The Minister is beating against an important principle, namely that the lines contain the eventual concept that the board must presume the innocence of the accused whatever his record.

Mr. MacKay: I appreciate the point that my hon. and learned Friend has made. However, if amendments Nos. 14 and 29 were made, the board would have to take into account previous convictions when considering factor of paragraph (a). In turn, that would imply that the accused would have to provide such details. I do not believe that hon. Members want that. We are agreed that if the accused believes these facts to be relevant to the discussion under (3)(a) as to whether he may or may not be sent to prison if found guilty, he ought to be able to tell the board that he has these previous convictions so that the board can make a proper assessment. If my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross had previous convictions and I did not, in my case the board might decide that I would not be sent to prison for an offence even if I was found guilty. It would be different for my hon. and learned Friend who may have a few previous convictions for the same kind of offences. He may be in danger. That was the argument that was put to me. I accepted that, I understand that and I have presented the amendments today. However, I do not believe that the fears expressed by hon. Members about the proposition in the consultation paper that previous convictions should be taken into account are justified other than in the simple case we have already referred to, in that, it increases the chance of an applicant going to prison. The amendment does not go beyond the particular point upon which we are all agreed.

Mr. Wallace: Why were these lines inserted in the first place?

Mr. MacKay: They were inserted simply because the reaction to the proposal in the consultation paper was such that it was felt that they ought to be there.

Mr. Wallace: They are very limited.

Mr. MacKay: I do not think that they are limited, and (3)(a) is one of the principal factors. Whether or not someone will be sent to prison if he or she is found guilty is an important factor which the board must be able to consider properly. I have accepted the argument that the board can do that only if someone with previous convictions can give that information to the board and it can take that into account in a positive way. That is the purpose of the amendment.

I understand that hon. Members are frightened that the amendment does more than that, but I assure them that, after much consideration and discussion with my advisers, I am satisfied that my amendment does what I believe it does, not what other hon. Members fear that it does, in addition to what we all want it to do.

In amendments Nos. 15 and 16, I understand the fear that the present formulation might discriminate against those not currently in employment. However, the amendments are too nebulous. Conviction for all but the most trivial offences could be represented as impairing a person's employment prospects at some time in the future. Therefore, the test could be interpreted so as to cover almost any accused. It is not justifiable to make criminal legal aid available for offences which are minor in themselves and in their effect on the accused.

However, if it was interpreted more narrowly, there would still be the problem of assessing what employment prospects were relevant. The board will be perfectly entitled, and I should expect it, to take into account the likely effect on the prospects of employment where, in special circumstances, it was of special relevance. As the hon. Member for Garscadden said, we are not defining the interests of justice, we are simply listing some factors. It is not an exhaustive list. If, in the opinion of the board, considering the applicant and the case, other factors are relevant, the board will take them into account.

It is not desirable to have a specific provision, because it cannot be written other than very vaguely.

Mr. Wallace: I have listened to the Minister's reply and to the exchanges which have taken place, and I remain unconvinced. On employment factors, we all know of cases where the plea in mitigation is that the accused has a reasonable prospect of gaining employment, which could be knocked on the head if he is imprisoned. Since we are excluding that, the signal might go out to the board—despite what the Minister says here—that that was not a proper factor for it to consider. It is regrettable that he has not accepted the amendment.

What is more fundamental is the Minister's intransigence with regard to the amendments in my name and in the name of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewer). None of them undermines the principle which we have been trying to uphold. Indeed, they show concisely what was in the mind of the Committee. The Minister accepted that those two lines were inserted in the Bill because widespread anxiety had been expressed. By removing them from the Bill, he gives rise to that anxiety

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 17, line 8, leave out 'substantial' and insert 'non-frivolous'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this, it may be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 18, in page 17, line 8, leave out 'substantial' and insert 'positive'.

No. 19, in page 17, line 8, after 'of evidence', insert 'or procedure'.

No. 20, in page 17, line 8, at end insert 'technical, confused'.

No. 24, page 17, line 17, at end insert—

(f) the facts and circumstances surrounding the charge or charges are complex or confused.'.

Mr. Wallace: These are somewhat technical but nevertheless important amendments concerning the interests of justice. Many of us would rather that there was no requirement that the interests of justice should be satisfied before the granting of criminal legal aid in summary proceedings. We accept, however, that such factors are part of the law and hope that we can make amendments to improve them. Amendment No. 17 concerns clause 24(3)(b) which provides:

"the determination of the case may involve consideration of a substantial question of law, or of evidence of a complex or difficult nature".

We are proposing that the word "substantial" should be deleted and the word "non-frivolous" inserted. Frivolous is a word that is not entirely common in our statutes—certainly not in Scotland—but the Government have set the precedent in subsection (3)(e).

This is important because the Government are proposing a relatively high test—

"a substantial question of law"—

before the applicant is entitled to have legal representation. If any question of law is to be involved, it seems only fair that an accused person should have the right to legal representation. One would like to see equality of arms without any reference to the interests of justice, but when we introduce matters of a legal nature it seems unfair that the accused individual should not have the benefit of legal advice and representation in preparation for his trial.

Amendment No. 19 relates not only to the question of evidence but to cases in which an accused person gets into difficulties as a result of the procedures.

Amendment No. 20 relates to cases where the evidence or procedure is not only difficult and complex but technical. We are again dealing with an individual who is charged with a criminal offence, and it is only fair that he should have the advantage of legal representation if matters of a technical nature—which he could not be expected to understand—are involved.

Amendment No. 24 extends that to the facts and circumstances surrounding the charges, not simply to narrow questions of evidence or procedure. These are perhaps limited and small amendments, but they are intended to be advantagous to the person who stands accused and who otherwise would not have the benefit of legal representation.

Mr. Dewar: We can now get back to the even tenor of our ways after the excitements of the Division. I am sure that hon. Members, particularly on the Conservative Benches, are grateful to the Liberals for calling that vote, as it has proved that they are alive and well and doing their duty—all 40 of them. [Interruption.] Government Back Benchers have duties as undistinguished and unromantic foot soldiers in the Lobby—[Interruption.] I genuinely did not hear what the Secretary of State for Scotland said. I am not always as fortunate as that. If he goes on like this, I shall have to ask for the protection of the Chair.

I do not want to follow the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) through the Liberal suggestions, which he described as modest. I notice that one amendment seeks to import into the Bill the words "technical" and "confused". That had a certain symbolic importance that I found quiet attractive. I was also attracted to the amendment that put "procedure" after the work "evidence". That may be because I remember the headings of the examination syllabus at Glasgow university many years ago.

I wish to speak to amendment No. 18, which stands in my name. This strikes at a point raised by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, when he referred to the use of the word "substantial" in relation to as one of the criteria that should be taken into account in deciding whether legal aid should be granted. I believe that the word "substantial" might give rise to difficulty.

I must confess that despite the engaging precedent in subsection (3)(e), which contains the word "frivolous", it does not strike me as being entirely suitable. When one adapts it to "non-frivolous" it does not have the right ring. It is a liberal word and does not appeal to me in any way.

My suggestion is that there is, perhaps, some virtue in removing the word "substantial" and inserting "positive". All these phrases are subjective in their definition, but clearly there is an invitation to the Legal Aid Board in the word "substantial" to take into account only questions of law of some weight. The board may look at it from the point of view of a lawyer in practice rather than as a layman. Questions of law may not seem profound to a solicitor and, indeed, may well be the stock in trade of a solicitor in daily practice. If that test were applied, a solicitor in daily practice may say that the provisions of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 for the adaption of a weapon were hardly a substantial question of law. If that line were taken and the accused were left unrepresented, that person could not be reasonably expected to wrestle with that point. The same point could properly be made about the law of reset or the doctrine of recent possession.

I see that the Solicitor-General for Scotland has appeared and taken his place. He will take my point. All those matters may reasonably be said not to be substantial, but they are important for the defence, if they are grasped, and if the defence is unrepresented, those matters would probably not be grasped and properly put. To overcome that it would be fairer and more sensible to insert "positive" as a qualification on the question of law that might arise.

Mr. Fairbairn: The hon. Gentleman will remember the case of the taxi driver who kept a tool of trade in his cab but was nevertheless convicted of contravention of the Prevention of Crime Act. Nobody would think that was a substantial matter, any more than they would think it was a substantial matter to argue whether a skean-dhu would be in contravention of that Act.

Mr. Dewar: The hon. and learned Gentleman is making my point perfectly fairly. There are all sorts of concepts in that area, for example about intention, which might arise and would be simple enough to a solicitor who knew the game, but which would go wholly unremarked by a client if he were unrepresented.

There is no point in making the point again and again, as I am sure that the Minister has grasped it. I should like him to say how he imagines the board would interpret the phrase. Let us imagine that the Minister lost his seat in Argyll and on the rescue operation principle for which the Conservative party is noted found himself sitting on the Scottish Legal Aid Board. How would he interpret "substantial" in connection with a question of law? How would the word "substantial" measure against recent possession, reset and the Prevention of Crime Act? They are three of the most obvious examples in this area. Would he not admit that it might be fairer slightly to downgrade the qualification to a positive question of law rather than to retain the word "substantial"? I await with interest the Minister's remarks.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall resist following the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) down the road on which he invited me to go with the suggestion that I might end up on the Legal Aid Board. I shall have to rest on my previous statement, which is that I shall not say much about what the Legal Aid Board should do in detail, because if I do I shall be accused of giving it instructions, or guidance.

Our discussion is about "substantial" versus "non-frivolous" or "positive". I am not a lawyer, but I would have thought that all legal proceedings involved "questions of law". The distinction is that we are suggesting that the word "substantial" should be in here. Hon. Members have suggested that there should be some qualification, and the two suggested words are "non-frivolous" and "positive".

I cannot recommend amendment No. 17, because it is a fairly inelegant formulation, even if the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) firmly rests on the fact that I use the word frivolous in another context later on. "Positive" raises the question of negative questions of law. If there can be a positive question, there can be a negative one. The concept of a "substantial" question of law is well understood and well-precedented, and it is reasonable in this context to use that as the qualifying word for a question of law.

Mr. Dewar: I recognise that the Minister does not wish to be seen to be anticipating the decisions of the board, but I am not asking him to make a decision in the normal sense of the word. If the term "substantial" is well understood, perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to tell us what he means by it? I wanted to help him by giving three sectors that are highly relevant and which will turn up frequently in applications. Does he think that they constitute substantial questions of law?

Mr. MacKay: That is up to the board to decide. If I were to start laying down, even at this late hour, what I think the board should be looking at on this or any other issue, hon. Members would rightly say that I was attempting to give the board guidance beyond that which I have said all along I would not be prepared to do. The board must look at these cases.

Every question is a question of law. The Bill points the board towards looking at those that are substantial, but it must decide. It is the only body that can decide what is or is not a substantial question of law.

Amendment No. 19 would cause the paragraph to refer to the "consideration of . . . evidence or procedure of a complex or difficult nature."

Merely as a matter of drafting, that seems to me an unsatisfactory formulation. It is possible for difficult questions of law to arise in relation to criminal procedure, but that, as I think the House will know, is already covered by the first part of paragraph (b) in its present form. Amendment No. 20, again, seems to miss the point. The fact that evidence is technical will either make it difficult or it will not. If it does, it is already covered. If it does not, it is difficult to see why it is a factor which particularly points towards a need for legal aid.

As to amendment No. 24, if the facts and circumstances surrounding the charge are complex or confused, it seems likely that that will result in consideration of complex or difficult evidence being involved, so that paragraph (b) will come into play. The same applies to the reference to "confused" in amendment No. 20. The proposed new paragraph would certainly overlap with paragraph (b) in a confusing way, but where there were special circumstances which made it desirable in the interests of justice that legal aid should be available, the board would of course have to take account of them. I emphasise again that the specified factors are not the only factors which must be taken into account—the list is not a restrictive one. The test remains, as it always has been, whether it is in the interests of justice that legal aid should be made available. Therefore, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendments.

Mr. Fairbairn: My hon. Friend the Minister knows that I do not like this clause, and my fondness for it has not been improved by his remarks. I noticed that he substantially avoided the substantial question that he was substantially asked by two substantial Members of the House about what he meant by "substantial."

Mr. MacKay: Positive.

Mr. Fairbairn: I do not know whether my hon. Friend meant "positive." However, he was very positive in being negative about being positive.

It is important that we should not pass over this definition without understanding its implications. It is no good saying that it has no implications or that it has any implications. If substantial means anything — and positive would mean nothing different—either it means something, or it means nothing. That is what I find offensive about it.

It is a fallacy, into which even the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) fell — possibly because he did not take part in the Committee proceedings —to imagine that the factors to be taken into account by the board in determining whether it is in the interests of justice, will be taken into account by the board. It is not the board that will take them into account. It will be a single official to whom the file goes who will take them into account. It is a fictional board. That may be another example of where one may use the word "substantial". Substantially it is the board, but in fact it is an official. The file will be interpreted by an official.

As for the idea that it will be interpreted by a lawyer or by anyone who has the slightest concept of what is a substantial point of law, what do we as lawyers mean by "a substantial point of law"? We mean a point of substance—in other words, a point that is valid. That is what we mean in law when we talk about a point of substance. We talk about substantial law. There is a branch of substantial law.

Unfortunately, in this clause we have created a variety of both meaningful and meaningless phrases that are capable of any interpretation. That task will not be undertaken by the board. That is not its function. Even if it were its function, we do not know that it is its function, because the Minister has been careful to tell us that we do not yet know what its function is. So let us forget about that. We must be quite clear that when we are dealing with a substantial question of law, we are not talking about anything that cannot be denied by an official who decides to deny it, or about anything that cannot be admitted by an official who does not understand it. I do not know what it means. An official will not know what it means. It is capable of any interpretation whatsoever in any circumstances. It is unfortunate—I say it again and I hope that it will be written into the hearts of this board when eventually it discovers what its purpose is—that here again we have, in just one adjective, an illustration of a meaningless direction, even on the face of the Bill.

I should like to know what an insubstantial question of law is. I have argued many such questions, and won. I have even defended people who stood to suffer the death penalty on what might be regarded as insubstantial questions of law. Therefore, we have to remind ourselves again that the language of the Bill is unfortunate and capable of any interpretation. The warning must go out that the interpretation must be on the side of bureaucracy.

Mr. Wallace: I very much share the view expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). He has reiterated the difficulties encountered when considering the interests of justice. Although the Minister said that the idea of a substantial point of law was common and well precedented, he refused to accept any intervention that might have asked him to spell out what he meant by "substantial". He has often told us that he does not want to lay down instructions about what the board may or may not do, but I almost think that he is protesting too much. His failure to explain almost amounts to an unwillingness to perform his duties to the House. He has said that a substantive point of law is well documented and precedented, so there is an obligation on him to tell us what is meant by that phrase.

I am

Mr. Fairbairn: The hon. Gentleman made an important lapsus linguae. He referred to a substantive point of law, which is very different from a substantial point of law. A substantive point of law is comprehended, but a substantial point of law is not. Does the Minister mean a substantive point of law? If the factors to be taken into account by the board in the interests of justice include a substantial question of law—it should, of course, be substantive—does it include the certificate that a judge may grant under the Act of Adjournal for additional funds to be granted? That might be an important purpose. It would be a substantial point of law, but not a substantive point of law.

Mr. Wallace: I think that I understand what the hon. and learned Gentleman has said. The Minister said that the phrase was well precedented, but he probably meant "substantive", and I fell into the trap of using the wrong term as a result. I do not think that a substantial point of law is necessarily well documented or precedented. The Minister certainly gave us no idea of the origin of that precedent and was not prepared to expand on it.

The Minister seemed to think that the procedure would be covered by the earlier part of paragraph (b), where if says:

"the determination of the case may involve consideration of a substantial question of law".

Procedure inevitably involves points of law, but the point is that just as evidence is separate from questions of law, so is procedure.

I am disappointed that the Minister has been so negative about these constructive amendments.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 17, line 17, at end insert—

(f) 'the accused has been remanded in custody pending trial.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 22, in page 17, line 17, at end insert—

'(f) the accused supplies with his application a detailed statement of his defence which if held true by the Court would be bound to result in the accused's acquittal of all or any of the charges libelled or in the deletion of any material part of a charge.'.

No. 23, in page 17, line 17, at end insert—

'(f) that the nature of the defence involves the tracing and interviewing of witnesses or the expert cross examination of a Crown witness.'.

No. 25, in page 17, line 17, at end insert—

(f) the accused is charged in some special capacity within the meaning of section 312*(x)* of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975.'.

No. 26, in page 17, line 17, at end insert—

'(f) it would be unlawful or inappropriate for the accused to seek to prerecognise a Crown witness.'.

No. 27, in page 17, line 17, at end insert—

(f) the conviction might involve substantial prejudice in related civil proceedings (whether actually anticipated, contemplated or could be anticipated).'.

Mr. Wallace: These amendments again relate to factors that should be taken into account when the board determines whether any application for criminal legal aid in summary cases is in the interests of justice. The amendment states that it would be in the interest of justice for legal aid to be granted if the "accused has been remanded in custody pending trial".

At present, under clause 22, if a person is in custody and is being prosecuted under summary procedure, he is automatically granted legal aid if he has tendered a plea of not guilty, and if he has made application to the board for legal aid in connection with those proceedings. Legal aid is automatically available to him until his application has been determined by the board.

The amendment seeks to make it a relevant factor—because of the Government's scheme it can be no more than that—for the board to consider that the accused has been remanded in custody pending trial, and, by implication, is unlikely to be liberated from custody until such time as his trial takes place.

That is an important amendment, put forward in a non-partisan way, and I hope that the Minister will consider it favourably. When we discussed it in Committee he was unable to give any satisfactory answer to the simple question of how, if one does not have legal representation, one goes about preparing a defence from prison? The things that must be done in preparing a defence, not least taking prerecognitions from witnesses, all involve some degree — [Interruption.] I do not know whether the Minister is suggesting that I should wind up or carry on. If he tells me that he will accept the amendment I shall be only too pleased to wind up quickly.

If somebody is in custody, preparing himself for trial, he should at the very least have legal aid to enable him to do it properly. If he is to be prosecuted by a lawyer who will have had all the advantages which go with that, his not having legal aid in such circumstances is virtually to expect him to defend himself with one hand tied behind his back.

Amendment No. 22 says:

"the accused supplies with his application a detailed statement of his defence which if held true by the Court would be bound to result in the accused's acquittal of all or any of the charges libelled or in the deletion of any material part of a charge."

That was canvassed in Committee. It requires a detailed statement of the defence so that one which says, "It wasn't me" or "I wasn't there" would not be sufficient. The Minister's response to that in Committee was that every cock-and-bull story under the sun would be put forward. With respect, it is not for the Minister or the board to determine what is or is not a cock-and-bull story. That is, in a summary case, properly the province of the sheriff or possibly the lay magistrate. It is for him to determine whether the defence put forward by the accused is a cock-and-bull story. For the board to in some way determine that involves a degree of subjective judgment which would not be welcome.

Amendment No. 23 says:

"that the nature of the defence involves the tracing and interviewing of witnesses or the expert cross examination of a Crown witness".

Again, that almost speaks for itself. The person who does not have legal assistance and all the advantages that go with that could well be put at a disadvantage if the preparation of his defence involved considerable work in trying to track down witnesses. In particular, if there was an expert cross-examination of a Crown witness.

Amendment No. 25 says:

"the accused is charged in some special capacity within the meaning of section 312*(x)* of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975."

That includes, for example, where someone might be charged in the capacity of a licence holder, the master of a ship or the occupier of a house, not a person in any straightforward individual capacity but where there is some additional complicating factor. That may not be sufficient in the eyes of the board to qualify under any of the headings in part III, but nevertheless it puts someone into a slightly different position for which legal aid would seem to be fair.

Amendment No. 26 says:

"it would be unlawful or inappropriate for the accused to seek to prerecognise a Crown witness."

It can happen as a condition of bail that a person is not allowed to go anywhere near, let alone, speak to and take prerecognition from, a Crown witness. If he is not allowed legal representation, how in the world is he meant to prepare a proper defence? I hope that the Government will accept the amendment. It would not drive a coach and horses through the factors. The Minister has often said that his list of factors is not exhaustive and I believe that the amendment would improve the list.

It has been put to me that perhaps the last part of amendment No. 27, which refers to civil proceedings that could be anticipated, goes too far and if the Government will consider the principle, I shall draw back from having it expressed so widely. However, it is a matter of considerable relevance if a person charged with, say, a DHSS fraud involving a considerable sum pleads guilty, but it turns out that the sum involved is actually much less. There are cases where a conviction for an offence carries considerable weight in subsequent civil proceedings. A person could be seriously prejudiced if a charge went through because he had not had the benefit of legal advice.

Mr. Fairbairn: Surely a much more obvious example is the fact that under road traffic legislation a conviction can be taken as evidence in civil proceedings.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. and learned Member anticipated my next point. Perhaps the Minister feels that the amendment would open the legal aid door too wide, but if a conviction is virtually conclusive in ensuing civil proceedings, a significant sum of damages could be awarded against a person and have as much effect on his livelihood as the provisions in the clause. It would seem only right that such a person should have the benefit of legal representation. I hope that the Minister will respond more constructively to these amendments than he did to the previous group.

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) is an eternal optimist. I do not hold out much hope of a more positive response from the Minister.

I sense a slight feeling in the House that the debate is outstaying its welcome and we still have to deal with the important amendment No. 36. That will take some time, so I shall not indulge in list-building with the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, but I cannot resist saying that if the Government's business managers had listened to suggestions that this business could have been disposed of between 7 pm and 10 pm, we might have had a more concise debate. I fear that it takes considerably longer if we start at this strange hour of the night.

I shall not work my way laboriously through the list. All the factors come from the equality of arms stable, moving towards the principle that professional should be pitted against professional, which the Law Society endorses. Many cases are not brought to trial, but are diverted into other areas and it is said that when the procurator fiscal is on one side, there should be legal representation on the other. I do not go that far, but some factors mentioned by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland are valid and I hope that they are the sort of matters that could be added as necessary when individual cases are being scrutinised.

1.15 am

We could spend time scrutinising. I am fascinated by Amendment No. 22 which adds

"the accused supplies with his application a detailed statement of his defence which if held true by the Court would be bound to result in the accused's acquittal".

I do not think that we need that. It asks for more than, "It was nae me." There must be an explanation of why "it was nae me." That problem is covered by subsection (3)(e) which states:

"the defence to be advanced by the accused does not appear to be frivolous".

If a man explains what he was doing, he does not need a special defence but just to explain that he was not there and knows nothing about the offence. That cannot be described as a frivolous defence. It is a relevant and complete defence, if it is believed.

Amendment No. 23 states:

'that the nature of the defence involves the tracing and interviewing of witnesses or the expert cross examination of a Crown witness.'.

Any case which goes to trial and is properly prepared will involve Crown witnesses. Some solicitors would argue that even when a plea of guilty is likely to be entered, the Crown witnesses should be investigated to see whether the case stands up before the client pleads guilty. The Minister might say that amendment No. 23 might allow legal aid to be given in every case. There might be problems about that.

It is obviously unlawful to approach Crown witnesses, but I must comment on amendment No. 27, with which I sympathise. It says that "the conviction might involve substantial prejudice in related civil proceedings".

To say that proceedings "could be anticipated" takes the suggestion very broadly.

The point is substantial. We have discussed DHSS fraud. The adjustment to a plea is often an important service to the system, not just to the accused, but to the Crown. In complicated fraud cases, and smaller cases in terms of the sums involved, establishing the figure can be of importance. Amendment No. 27 has merit and my endorsement of it will gather strength from the fact that I have not urged the Minister to take all the others as a job lot. The amendments are worthy.

Mr. Fairbairn: Let us suppose that the Legal Aid Society is confronted by someone who says, "I didn't do it" and Crown evidence says that he did. That cannot be regarded as a frivolous defence. It is a substantial defence.

Mr. Dewar: I tremble to ask the Minister to consider the definition of "frivolous" because I shall be told that that impinges on the proper role of the House and that he is mute on the subject.

The hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) tempted me. I imagine that he is wrong in assuming that the Legal Aid Board would have evidence from the Crown. Presumably it would have nothing from the Crown in the same way as, at the moment, a sheriff merely has the complaint in front of him and the legal aid application and anything that may be said on behalf of the application. I may be wrong because I have not been through the Committee proceedings, but it did not occur to me that the Crown would be submitting evidence or that something like the summary to the fiscal would be available to the Legal Aid Board in considering an application.

The Minister might clarify that point. I assumed that that would not be so. Therefore, I agree that the term "frivolous" is difficult to envisage because clearly, if someone is denying the offence in the circumstances I have described by saying "I do not know anything about it. It must be mistaken identity. I was not there. I cannot give any details of the offence because I was not involved", it cannot be frivolous, whatever else it may be. It may turn out that the man is a blackhearted liar but it is certainly not a frivolous defence. If it stands up it is as good a defence as it is possible to imagine. I am not clear about the meaning of the word frivolous in subsection 3(e) or about the circumstances that are envisaged. If the Minister wishes to break the habit, I will not say of a lifetime, but of the life of the Bill, and give us some helpful information on that point I would be grateful.

Mr. John MacKay: Amendment No. 22 would appear to suggest that the production of a detailed but obviously totally spurious statement should be a factor that might support the grant of legal aid. Yet it is perfectly possible for an accused person to have a defence which is not a frivolous one but as to which he cannot produce any detailed statement, or his defence may simply be that he did not do it.

On amendment No. 23, which derives from one of the tests suggested by the Widgery committee for England and Wales, we share the view which was put by the Law Society of Scotland to the Royal Commission on legal services in Scotland, and which was accepted by that commission, that the formulation was not acceptable, since almost any case could be presented in such a way as to justify it. The real point which arises is dealt with in a clearer and more effective way by paragraph (b), which takes account of the possibility of complexities of evidence being involved, whether in preparation of the case or as requiring expert cross-examination.

Amendment No. 25 suggests that the mere fact that the accused is charged in a special capacity should necessarily be a factor supporting the grant of legal aid. I accept that in some cases such a special capacity will complicate matters, but that will not by any means always be the case. Where it is, the board will certainly be able to take account of it. Again, paragraph (b) will point it in that direction.

I have similar objections to amendments Nos. 26 and 27. Each refers to matters which, it is argued, could in particular circumstances be relevant to the board's consideration of the interests of justice. However, they are imprecise and are not of general application. For example, how is the board to judge that it is "inappropriate" for the accused to precognosce a Crown witness or know whether related civil proceedings are likely? It is true that the facts on which someone is convicted on a criminal charge could involve civil consequences which may be quite serious. For example, it could lay someone open for an action for damages. However, the civil consequences may be quite trivial in relation to the criminal charge. In such cases the decision should, in general terms, primarily depend on the criminal charge, not on the civil consequences. The difficulty with amendment No. 27 is that although it refers to substantial prejudice in civil proceedings, it makes no mention of whether the civil proceedings are of comparative importance in themselves or in relation to the criminal charge. Therefore, it seems better to leave the board to take into account any civil proceedings, if relevant, together with anything else that is relevant.

I again emphasise that the list of factors is not exclusive. The board's duty is to decide whether the grant of legal aid will be in the interests of justice, and in doing so it will take all these matters into account in so far as they are relevant.

Amendment No. 21 proposes that the fact that the accused has been remanded in custody pending trial should be a factor taken into account by the board in determining whether the interests of justice criterion is met. This would clearly be an important consideration for the board, whether it is specified on the face of the Bill or not. I was trying to show the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) that if he speeded up he might hear some good news because, on that basis, there is something to be said for spelling it out and I accept amendment No. 21 but not, I regret to say, the rest.

Mr. Wallace: I tried to tell the Minister that such a response would have the effect of shortening my remarks. I am grateful to him for accepting amendment No. 21. I heard what he said about the other amendments, and I accept that in some instances paragraph (b) is sufficient. I regret the hon. Gentleman's attitude to amendments Nos. 26 and 27, but he has suggested that if the degree of importance of the civil proceedings was spelt out there could be an addition at a later date.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 28, in page 17, leave out lines 18 and 19.—[Mr. John MacKay.]

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 17, line 21, leave out from 'Section' to end of line 23 and insert

'amend the list of circumstances in subsection (3) by adding new circumstances to the list'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 33, in page 17, line 21, leave out from 'above' to end of line 23 and insert 'by adding new factors to the list'.

Government amendment No. 34.

Mr. Wallace: The amendment is directed to the final part of clause 24(4). As things stand, the Secretary of State could delete any of the factors by regulation. In other words, he could use secondary legislation to delete primary legislation. The Government's amendment would remove the offending words about deletion but would still allow the Secretary of State to amend any of the factors set out in subsection (3).

The purpose of the amendment and amendment No. 33, which stands in the names of the hon. Members for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), is to limit any variation to addition. To allow the Secretary of State to amend or add leaves it open to possibility that he could amend existing provisions out of recognition, or even insert would what could amount to a negative provision. Allowing the Secretary of State to amend only by means of adding would ensure the integrity of the primary legislation.

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) has said that the Opposition's amendment, No. 33, strikes at the same point as the Liberal amendment. The arguments are similar. The Law Society of Scotland took the view—I paraphrase—that clause 24 contained within it the seeds of its own destruction. It was referring to the apparent possibility of primary legislation being changed by regulation. The Government's amendment does something to help by removing the possibility of subtracting one of the factors in clause 24(3). We want to go a little further by stopping the possibility of variation which may be so radical as to destroy. It is a simple issue which has been outlined succinctly by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland and I am prepared to leave the matter on that basis and listen to what the Minister has to say.

Mr. John MacKay: Government amendment No. 34, like amendments Nos. 33 and 34, is designed to meet the fear that was expressed in Committee that a power to the Secretary of State to delete factors might lead to the deletion of them all. My amendment would provide for existing factors to be amended or new ones to be added, whereas the other two amendments would confine the power to the addition of new factors alone.

It is essential that there should be the necessary flexibility to amend the present list. Changes may be required to take account of changes in criminal procedure or practice which mean that the wording of a factor is no longer apt, or it may be that the wording of one factor proves to be ambiguous in some unenvisaged way. Amendments Nos. 33 and 34 seem to assume that any new factors will be completely separate and free-standing. It is surely possible, however, that there will be an overlap between a new factor and an old one, so as to require consequential amendment of the existing factor. Indeed, the number of amendments tabled this evening to the factors in the Bill would seem to support the desirability of a power to amend. Any amendment would, of course, be made by regulations subject to affirmative resolution, and would therefore require the positive approval of both Houses. I therefore recommend amendment No. 34, which I believe meets the concerns which were expressed.

Mr. Wallace: There is not much that can be added to what I have said.

Amendment negatived.

1.30 am

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move amendment No. 36, in page 17, line 23, at end insert—

'(6) Where a person who is being prosecuted under summary procedure is not represented by a solicitor or counsel and has either—

(a) not applied for criminal legal aid in connection with the proceedings; or

(b) applied for criminal legal aid but been refused it on the grounds that it is not in the interests of justice,

the court at the trial diet may, if it considers that owing to the exceptional circumstances of the case it would be inequitable to proceed with the trial without such representation and without legal aid being made available to him, adjourn the diet to enable an application for legal aid to be made to the Board which shall consider the application expeditiously.

(7) Where the trial of an accused person is adjourned as is mentioned in subsection (6) above, and he has made an application to the Board, criminal legal aid shall be available to him until his application is determined by the Board.

(8) Where any person to whom criminal legal aid has been made available in pursuance of subsection (7) above has his application for criminal legal aid under subsection (6) above refused by the Board on the ground that it is satisfied that subsection (1)(a) above does not apply in his case, the Board may require him to pay to the Fund the whole or part of the amount of any sums paid out of the Fund under section 4(2) (a) of this Act in respect of the criminal legal aid so made available.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may also consider amendments to the proposed amendment: (a) in subsection (6) at end insert 'or alternatively, if it is in the interests of justice that the trial should proceed, grant legal aid forthwith'.

(c), in subsection 8, at end add

'but in deciding what if any payment should be made the Board must have regard to the circumstances of the applicant and his ability to pay.'.

Mr. MacKay: This amendment fulfils an undertaking that I gave in Committee on 1 July to provide for the exceptional case, where a person who is not legally represented in summary proceedings appears for trial and the court concludes he should be represented—either in his own interests or in the interests of someone else, such as a child witness. Under subsection (6), the court is enabled to adjourn the trial to allow the accused to apply for legal aid—or re-apply if he had previously been refused under the interests of justice criterion. The board is obliged to handle the application expeditiously and we would envisage that it could be dealt with in a couple of days. As I said in Committee, we would not wish to give a court a general power to overrule decisions by the board—or substitute itself for the board—since this could re-introduce the present inconsistencies between courts in the award of legal aid—at least for some types of cases. Reference of the case from the court to the board avoids this difficulty. Where legal aid had been refused by the board earlier, the court would in effect be asking the board to review the case in the light of the court's expressed view that legal aid should be available. However, subsection (7) also provides that automatic legal aid will be available from the date of application until the application is determined, so legal aid will be available to cover the preparation of the defence. Subsection (7) could also be used to ensure that the accused was legally represented if, very exceptionally, the court decided that the trial had to proceed more or less immediately—perhaps because it was undesirable or difficult to recall witnesses for a later diet. Subsection (8) provides for the situation where the board refuses an application on grounds of financial eligibility. As the legal costs will have to be paid by the board under the automatic provisions of subsection (7), it is only right that the board should have power to recover those costs from an accused who is able to afford to meet them himself.

I cannot recommend amendment (a), as this would in effect give the court power to award legal aid in all cases where it considered the trial should proceed. This would, on my understanding, be contrary to the wishes of bodies representative of the courts who no longer want to be involved in the actual award of legal aid and in the determination of interests of justice. My amendment makes legal aid available in the exceptional cases where the court considers legal representation necessary. It reduces to a minimum the disruption of court business, and preserves the essential principle of the new system that all applications for legal aid in summary criminal cases should be dealt with by the board for the sake of maximum consistency. I appreciate the reasons for amendments (b) and (c), but I cannot commend them to the House.

Clearly we would not wish legal aid to be given to someone who can pay for his defence. This is the reason and the need for subsection (8), which in general should come into play only when the accused has not applied for legal aid. Where he has previously applied the board will normally have considered his financial circumstances and whether the expenses of the case can be met without undue hardship to him or his dependants.

When the board considers an application referred to it under subsection (6), it will, as with other applications, have regard to the financial circumstances of the accused and as indeed subsection (8) states, require payment only where it is not satisfied that the expenses of the case cannot be met without undue hardship to the accused or his dependants.

The amendment in my name clearly and adequately fulfils the undertakings that I gave. It achieves what many people want, as it creates a fallback position which the courts can exercise, but it preserves the board's right to decide finally on the granting of legal aid. I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr. Dewar: I genuinely regret that we come to this matter at 1.30 in the morning. We would normally have a lengthy debate on such a matter and that would be the correct way to proceed. There has been a long and well-argued campaign on the question whether the courts should have a residuary power to grant legal aid. I am now conscious of the fact that the debate will have to be telescoped into a few minutes. That is not good for the process of law reform in Scotland or for the legislative process.

The Minister said very briskly and definitively that the amendment that he has tabled meets the promise that he gave in Committee. He knows that that arguably is not the case. I do not wish to weary my colleagues but the matter is clearly dealt with in columns 275 to 277 of the Committee proceedings. The Minister said, whimsically, that there had been some disagreement on the matter during the previous sitting,

"so I took the opportunity offered by the lovely weather in my constituency over the weekend to sit and contemplate these questions. Some may think that a dangerous occupation, but I succeeded, and in between I attacked the odd weed."

That is a rather ungracious way of referring to his colleagues. He continued:

"Mostly, I sat and thought."

On this occasion, the Minister's thought was fairly productive, because he went on to say:

"It has been put to me, and I entirely appreciate, that there may be circumstances in which it is desirable that the trial should proceed more or less immediately. For example, if very young or old witnesses have been called, the court may decide that, whatever else may be involved, it is not in the interests of these young witnesses that they be stood down until another day. In such circumstances we would propose that it should be possible to apply for legal aid on the spot — possibly by giving the application to the Clerk of Court, automatic legal aid would be immediately available and the trial could proceed." — [Official Report, First Scottish Standing Committee; 1 July 1986, c. 275-77.]

To a layman, that would suggest that the Minister was in complete agreement with what I am trying to achieve: that in unusual circumstances, where the sheriff is satisfied that the matter should proceed, the court should have power to grant legal aid. The clerk of court shall receive the application, legal aid shall be granted and the court will proceed with the trial. That was the scenario specifically stated by the Minister. It is not what appears in the amendment, and he is being a little disingenuous—I put it no higher than that, because I am sure that no malice is involved — when he says triumphantly that he has fulfilled the obligation that he gave to the Committee in this amendment.

The Minister should not have departed from what he appeared to say in Committee. The compromise that he has produced is clumsy and unsatisfactory. It is common ground between us that, in some circumstances, it will be proper and necessary for the trial to proceed. It is merely an argument over how to meet those circumstances. It is not just a question of trial witnesses. Witnesses may have come from abroad—perhaps from very far away—and cannot be sent away and brought back other than at enormous inconvenience and public expense. It may be a case of the witnesses being assembled in the court and the solicitor for the defence being ready to proceed and familiar with the case. There is an argument for allowing the matter to proceed rather than to adjourn the case and resubmit or submit for the first time an application to the Scottish Legal Aid Board.

The Minister said—I gathered that this would be his position — that that objective can be achieved, because the court can adjourn for an hour, half an hour or even a notional 10 minutes, and that the trial can proceed on the basis that the Legal Aid Board will ultimately consider the application and grant or refuse legal aid. That is an artificial way of meeting the difficulty.

I do not deny that the circumstances should be exceptional. After all, we have trusted the courts in the past to be responsible about acting only in narrow confines of special circumstances. I have in mind the residual power in the Bail Act to set money bail, which has not been abused by the courts. There is no reason to believe that sheriffs would abuse a residual power if it was left to them. It is better to do it in that open and above-board way than to do it by straining the meaning of the amendment, which adds this new procedure to clause 24.

There may be some difficulties—I shall not canvass them at length, but I cannot resist mentioning it—about what constitutes an adjournment. I have not done much research into it, but someone drew my attention to Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, a publication with which I am not familiar——

Mr. Fairbairn: Oh!

Mr. Dewar: It may shock and horrify the hon. and learned Gentleman, but I assure him that Stroud's Judicial Dictionary is not upon the desk of every jobbing solicitor in the west of Scotland. Perhaps it should be. I give him that insight into the real life of the legal profession.

I went to Stroud to discover what an adjournment was. I came across the first and hopeful sentence — [Interruption.] I cannot engage in this badinage. Let me give just a suspicion of the argument:

"The word 'adjourn' must be construed with reference to the object of the context, and with reference to the object of the enquiry."

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dewar: I thought that that would be considered broadly helpful by the House. The paragraph went on in an equally lucid and helpful fashion.

I concede that I then went to the fifth edition of Renton and Brown, a work with which I am not familiar, but I remember it at least. I thought that I was on to a good thing because I found in paragraph 10.12:

"Every trial must proceed from day to day until concluded, unless the court sees cause to adjourn over a day or days."

A footnote on the following page says:

"Trials no longer proceed uninterruptedly, but are adjourned overnight and over weekends as necessary."

That is an extremely good point. It suggests that short adjournments may not be competent, but I concede to the House that if one reads paragraph 10.13, it becomes clear that one can adjourn for short periods for lunch or almost any other reason that the court gets into its mind. It seems to be wide. Perhaps the Minister is right in saying that a half-hour adjournment might be possible before starting the trial, thus getting within the ambit of the amendment that he has tabled. However, it seems to be a forced and unlikely way of achieving that. Paragraph 10.14 of Renton and Brown says that

"An adjournment at the trial diet ought always to be avoided, if possible. Serious expense and inconvenience may be caused to jurors and witnesses, and there is always the danger of losing valuable evidence in consequence of the delay."

Perhaps that would not happen if there were a short adjournment, but the general message is valid. I do not like the artificial way in which the matter is being managed. The Government have seen a difficulty, and apparently have recognised it, but they are trying to meet it by stretching subsections (6) and (7), which is adding to clause 24 in a way that I do not think does anyone much credit.

The Minister says cheerfully that he is giving an important new power in his amendment. I ask him seriously to answer this question. Is it not true that the power to adjourn in that way would have been open to the court anyway? The statutory power that he is giving is adding nothing to the range of options open to the court. It could have adjourned to give a chance for a legal aid application to be submitted in any event if it wanted. It would have been valuable to give the residuary power to the court. That would have met the narrow range of circumstances that we have been discussing.

[Mr. Dewar]

It is a shame that the Minister has not taken a more open attitude. I notice that the Law Society has described his amendment as "very disappointing and indeed seriously defective."

I do not expect the Minister to take the Law Society's point of view. Obviously, he has to strike a balance between his advisers and those who advise him from outside the House, but it is interesting to remember that before the amendment had been produced, the Law Society was saying in an earlier memorandum after the Committee stage:

"In particular, we are grateful to the Government for agreeing to the principle of a residual right being given to Sheriffs and Magistrates to grant legal aid in exceptional cases. As at the time of writing this memorandum we have not had sight of the actual Government amendment, we are grateful to the Government for the acceptance of this very important principle."

Of course, the Law Society had been reading the Committee proceedings, which I quoted. Understandably, it has been very disappointed by what the Minister has produced, because it is a departure from what he apparently promised. I repeat that point. The Minister is not doing himself justice in this matter. I do not see the danger of giving that residual power — it would be a much more sensible and logical way in which to meet the difficulty that everyone accepts may arise. I do not want to build any hopes on a positive response. The Minister has already said that he does not favour amendment (a), but it is simple, effective and available. I should have thought that he would have considered it favourably.

The Minister made it perfectly clear that he wanted nothing to do with amendments (b) or (c). I quite understand his argument, although I do not accept it, concerning amendment (b), which would leave out subsection (8). I have some doubts about importing into the legal aid system in Scotland a recovery of costs. I recognise that it is a special circumstance in which someone has gone ahead with a trial and been refused legal aid on the ground of means, but that is still a breach of an important principle that we do not have a contributory legal aid system for criminal legal aid. I am not sure that the Minister is wise to breach it in this way. If he had accepted amendment (a) he would have done much to mitigate that risk, because if he had allowed the sheriff to make a decision on whether legal aid should be granted, he could inquire into the accused's means and we would not have been in this position. That is a reasonable argument for the amendment.

If the Minister is against me on amendment (b), I do not see why he should not look more sympathetically upon the modest amendment (c), which proposes:

"in deciding what if any payment should be made the Board must have regard to the circumstances of the applicant and his ability to pay".

I should like to give an example of what might happen. A young man, who has not applied for legal aid, comes to trial, and it becomes evident for a variety of reasons that we could suppose that he ought to have applied for legal aid, but the sheriff wants the trial to proceed because of wider interests. He says that the young man should apply, and the preparation for the trial goes ahead while the legal aid application is being considered. It might be rejected for means. The accused will suddenly discover that, even if he is aquitted, he might very well be faced with a bill of £400 or £500, which it is proposed to claw back from him on the grounds that he was not awarded legal aid because of his means.

1.45 am

Means are a very difficult concept. I know — I have no reason to believe that it would be different under the Scottish Legal Aid Board — that there are people deciding legal aid who may take the view that someone who lives on benefit, but at home with his parents, has sufficient means, if he saves hard, to afford his defence. Very real hardship could be involved. To guard against that, it is no bad thing to write into the Bill the proviso that payment should be asked for only after having had regard to the person's ability to pay and his circumstances. That is not committing us to anything very dearly, but it might guard against the type of hardship that I have outlined.

The Minister has shown a willingness, perhaps on a rather random basis, to take one of a selection of amendments offered to him. I would prefer him to take amendment (a), which is a key and by far the most important of the group. If he is not minded to do that, I do not think that it is unreasonable to ask him to consider amendment (c) in a reasonably positive way, especially as it would apply only in the type of circumstances I have outlined.

I hope that I have advanced my arguments at not too wearisome length. This is an important matter and Government amendment No. 36 is an important importation at a late stage. I only regret that I have had to detain the House at such an unearthly hour of the morning, but I do not apologise for that.

Mr. Fairbairn: I assure the Minister that, if I had thought that he would produce an amendment such as this, I should have regarded it as in complete contradiction to what he said to the Committee, for he told the Committee that he would give a residual power to the court to grant legal aid in circumstances exceptional, not to have a second bite at the cherry, not to provide another way around a refusal but when it was just to do that. This amendment does nothing whatever of that kind. It involves a system that is incomprehensible and absurd. First, if it occurs to a court that a person should be granted legal aid, for any of the reasons adumbrated in Committee — that the person should have applied, that difficult matters arise, that witnesses cannot understand the language, it matters not — are we seriously suggesting that the sheriffs and magistrates of Scotland should be less trusted than the unknown officials of the new legal aid board? What superior criteria will be applied by the board that will not be applied by the courts?

Let us be clear about what will happen, if that is possible. If a person has not applied for legal aid, or he applied and it was refused,

"the court at the trial diet may, if it considers that owing to the exceptional circumstances of the case it would be inequitable to proceed with the trial without such representation and without legal aid being made available to him, adjourn the diet to enable an application for legal aid to be made to the Board which shall consider the application expeditiously."

Let us think about what will happen. Let us suppose that little John Smith is being tried for hooliganism at a football match and it is discovered that the charge is defective, that he cannot speak, that he does not understand or that he has witnesses whom he has not called who can demonstrate his innocence. Let us also suppose that the sheriff takes the view that it would be in the interests of justice that he should exceptionally have legal aid. If the sheriff adjourns, what does John Smith do? Does he telephone the legal aid board and say, "The sheriff has just told me that I should have applied for legal aid. I wanted to do this expeditiously so I am ringing up to ask you if you will give me legal aid." The reply will probably be, "Why? Who am I speaking to?"

The whole thing is absurd. The courts should be able to grant it as a residual power. But instead of a residual power, the amendment is an absurd second best. I do not comprehend how this unfortunate, unrepresented person will activate the mind of the sheriff to ensure that the Legal Aid Board expeditiously grants, or considers an application for, legal aid.

The amendment also states that:

"criminal legal aid shall be available to him until his application is determined by the Board."

What does that mean? Subsection (7) also states:

"Where the trial . . . is adjourned . . . and he has made an application to the Board".

Therefore, the person has to make an application. How will he do so? By telephone from Glasgow sheriff court? Will he say, "The sheriff tells me I should have been legally aided because I cannot speak English properly"?

This is an absurd misunderstanding of the promise given by the Minister, which was that in the circumstances the court could say that it is right that legal aid should be granted. This amendment is not an answer to what the Minister said. It allows the court to hold up proceedings while the applicant, unaided, attempts to contact the board.

I do not understand the procedure or mechanism. It would at least be sensible to accept amendment (a). If that is not accepted, the complicated procedure that the Minister is introducing will not solve the problem, and in no way does it answer the promise that he gave us. It merely makes a complicated, expensive and impossible mess of a simple position in which a court may say to itself, "I wish to be aided by having the person before me represented." That is essentially what the matter is about. I ask the Minister to consider that because his amendment is nonsense, its process is unworkable and it does nothing for justice. It does not give a court the residual right to grant legal aid. The purpose of the Bill is to avoid expense, but I cannot imagine a more complicated way of adding to it.

Mr. Gordon Wilson: Again, I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). I do not understand why the Government have made this mistake. I cannot imagine how one could come across a more convoluted, awkward, absurd solution. The residual right of the courts to grant legal aid would be the simplest, most effective way of dealing with the position. It beggars the imagination that the Government have gone to all this difficulty in concocting an amendment which is nonsense.

If legal aid is granted under the Government's amendment, it will effectively guarantee the fees of the solicitor or counsel, but there will be no guarantee to the accused. He must accept the lottery until the application is decided by the court that legal aid may be provided, if the trial proceeds and if the court finds it necessary to recommend that legal aid should be granted. It may do so, not necessarily to help the accused, but because of the need to protect child witnesses and to ensure that things are done properly and decorously, and that justice also applies to them. An accused person who is granted legal aid in those circumstances has no guarantee that the expenses will be paid. It is remarkably unsatisfactory.

Why are the Government seemingly not prepared to trust our courts to administer properly? The Minister says that he has told us that the people connected with the courts are not keen to accept the burden. I do not care tuppence whether they are keen to accept the burden. If it is in the interests of justice that they should be given that burden, let them carry it out. If that obligation is placed on them, I trust them to do it with the delicacy one would expect of them in the circumstances.

The Minister has come up with a dog's breakfast. I do not know why he has gone to such efforts to avoid the simple solution to deal with the exceptional circumstance. [Interruption.] The Solicitor-General for Scotland mutters on the sidelines. I would have thought that he might be able to give better advice to the Minister.

Mr. Wallace: Perhaps I may be permitted to a limited extent to come to the Minister's assistance. What he has come up with is much in line with what he said in Committee, which was why I was not as overjoyed as other members of the Committee seemed to be when he made it clear that the board should consider the application, although the sheriff or magistrate felt that it was in the interests of justice that legal aid should be granted. That is why I was not quite as excited by the part concession as some hon. Members were, and why I do not find what has been proposed this morning, while it is in line with what the Minister has suggested, is what I wish to see.

I say that as someone who has in general welcomed the role that sheriffs and magistrates have played up to now in determining whether criminal legal aid should be given, or, in some cases, taken away. However, there are inconsistencies between one sheriff court and another, and some of them are quite glaring, and were mentioned in the Committee. Another problem will be appreciated by hon. Members who have constituencies where there is only one sherfiff presiding in the sheriff's court, and he, invevitably, has to determine the legal aid application, and later the case.

The general rule for transferring these applications to the board is a good one. Nevertheless, there will still remain cases — no doubt rare ones — where in the circumstances that the sheriff or magistrate has to face, he believes that the interests of justice and the way that the case is conducted means that legal aid should be granted. The amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) talks about the "interests of justice", not solely about the interests of the accused. It may be in the interests of a child witness. The Government's proposal for a contrivance that is intended to operate in a way that one can get on with the trial, and the application for legal aid can go to the board later, is a second best option.

The double condition that has to be fulfilled before criminal legal aid will be made available is even worse. There is not only the danger of the trial being adjourned, but, as the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross pointed out, the problem that the accused has also to make application to the board. Both conditions must be fulfilled before legal aid can be made available. The position would be improved by letting the matter rest solely on the adjournment of the trial, so that a lawyer could be appointed to assist and make an application. That is not what it says here—perhaps it is not what the Minister intended.

The Bill is not satisfactory to meet the special conditions that have been envisaged. I hope that the Minister will be prepared to listen to what has been said, and look at it with some sympathy.

Mr. John MacKay: I apologise to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) for not dealing with amendment (c) but I do not consider it necessary, in so far as there is already a requirement on the board to take financial circumstances into account. In any case, the board would be considering whether to exercise its powers under subsection (8), which is a power only to take into account the individual's ability to pay. I do not think that a specific provision on the face of the Bill is needed to achieve it.

The Shorter Oxford dictionary defines adjournment as to "defer", or "put off". I am advised that there is no authority for the proposition that in the context of court proceedings, adjournment means only to put off to another day. There is English authority to the effect that it is the popular, as opposed to the technical, meaning of adjournment, which imports a requirement to put off to another day.

It is difficult to imagine a situation in which a case can proceed without enabling the solicitor to take instruction. I have read carefully what I said to the Committee. I can tell my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) that having done so, I believe that the amendment honours the commitment that I made. It preserves the position of the board, and gives an important safeguard to anyone who ends up in a court. If the sheriff or the justice, looking down from the bench, sees that something is amiss and that a person ought to be represented, this is a procedure and mechanism by which——

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. MacKay: I am about to conclude, but I shall give way.

Mr. Fairbairn: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Will he tell me what the mechanism is? It says:

"Where the trial of an accused person is adjourned"— assuming that it is competent in summary proceedings—

"as is mentioned in subsection (6) above, and he has made an application to the Board".

What does my hon. Friend imagine will happen? What does a 14-year-old boy do? Does he ring up the board? It has to be done expeditiously. What happens if he is not represented?

Mr. MacKay: My hon. and learned Friend was much more charitable when he heard me explain the matter in Committee. If he looks at column 277 he will see that I said:

"In such circumstances, we would propose that it should be possible to apply for legal aid on the spot—possibly by giving the application to the Clerk of Court, automatic legal aid would be immediately available and the trial could proceed." — [Official Report, First Scottish Standing Committee, 1 July 1986; c. 277.]

That is a sensible way of dealing with very special circumstances. As they will be very special and will not happen often, the procedure I have set out in my amendment will do what we all wish it to do.

Mr. Dewar: I am disappointed by the Minister's reply, although I am not surprised by it. We are looking at a man who has made up his mind, or who has had his mind made up for him; I am not quite sure which.

I am puzzled. It would have been much neater and saner and much more sensible to trust the courts, with their residual powers. No one has suggested that their powers are other than residual. That is why amendment (a) was drafted as it was: to make it clear that we were not trying to open the equivalent of a legal floodgate and that we were not inviting the courts on a daily basis to grant legal aid in an effort to circumvent the powers of the Scottish Legal Aid Board.

If the Minister is right in saying that the courts do not wish to be involved in legal aid, there is little danger of the power being abused. He was contradicted to some extent by his own argument on that point. However, the Minister is clearly determined that there shall be no breach of the general rule that the courts shall not be involved in the granting of legal aid. I find that strange. In solemn procedure the courts will be the principal grantors of legal aid.

In both the summary and the solemn procedure the courts will have the important residual power to decide on certification under the relevant section. The courts will also have the power to grant legal aid applications for findings of fact under the children's hearings system. The courts will be involved in a large area, and I do not think that it would have been dangerous to trust them with the residual power that we envisage. A mistake is being made. The system is being made to look a little silly. Interpretations and expectations that cannot be justified are being built upon this form of words.

The Minister did not deal with my specific point about whether the power to adjourn of the kind that is envisaged in his amendment already exists. I believe that it already exists. I am advised by those who are more skilled than I in these matters that that is the position. The Minister has been left with something of a nonsense, and he is asking that nonsense to deal with a problem with which it is incapable of dealing.

It is disappointing. I do not intend to withdraw amendment (a). I am not sure that I moved it formally. I do not know whether I have to do so, but if I have to move it formally I do so now. I have no intention of withdrawing it at this stage.

Amendment to the amendment negatived.

Amendment made:

No. 36, in page 17, line 23, at end insert—

"(6) Where a person who is being prosecuted under summary procedure is not represented by a solicitor or counsel and has either—

(a) not applied for criminal legal aid in connection with the proceedings; or

(b) applied for criminal legal aid but been refused it on the grounds that it is not in the interests of justice,

the court at the trial diet may, if it considers that owing to the exceptional circumstances of the case it would be inequitable to proceed with the trial without such representation and without legal aid being made available to him, adjourn the diet to enable an application for legal aid to be made to the Board which shall consider the application expeditiously.

(7) Where the trial of an accused person is adjourned as is mentioned in subsection (6) above, and he has made an application to the Board, criminal legal aid shall be available to him until his application is determined by the Board.

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move amendment No. 41, in page 40, line 37 at end insert—

'The Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980 (c. 52)

In section 9B(4) of the Tenants Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980 for the words "Legal Aid and Advice (Scotland) Acts 1967 and 1972 and to any provision of those Acts for payment of any sum into the legal aid fund" there shall be substituted the words "Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 and to any provision of that Act for payment of any sum into the Scottish Legal Aid Fund".'.

The amendment updates a reference to the existing legal aid legislation in the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980, which has been inserted by the Housing (Scotland) Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

Queen's consent signified—

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. John MacKay.]

2.12 am

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Douglas Fairbanks.

Mr. Fairbairn: I shall do my best to put on a reasonable performance.

I welcome some of the improvements that have been made to the Bill, but I deplore other alterations, such as the recent one. At this late hour, I should like to raise briefly one matter. The concept of fair and reasonable remuneration for work done was not considered necessary by the Government. They thought it inevitable that a fair and reasonable reward would be given. If that is so, and if the courts are not to be trusted with a penny of public money in order to grant legal aid to someone in exceptional circumstances who is on a summary criminal charge, the Government have a great opportunity to abolish the Act of Adjournal which requires that the moment that a criminal has happily departed from the dock by the front gate or back door—depending on the capacity of those who defended him or on the "interests of justice", as the Minister would obliquely state, without understanding what they are—the unfortunate instructing solicitor should be moved into the dock.

Counsel then has to represent the unfortunate instructing solicitor before the public in court, under the Act of Adjournal, to see whether he measured up to his ex-client's standards. Counsel has to represent the case that his work was, or was not, difficult, exceptional and lengthy, and say whether this or that is a fair or reasonable charge. Now that the Government have deleted the concept of fair and reasonable being a necessary qualification we should also delete the obscenity that counsel has to appear on behalf of the solicitor, or the solicitor has to appear on his own behalf, as if he was the accused.

I therefore hope that the Government will take this opportunity to remove a blot from our system. It is a scar on the solicitor's probity, and we could do without it. The solicitor should be paid according to his work. If these incompetent judges of ours cannot grant legal aid to a little boy, I do not see how they can sit in judgment on whether a solicitor is entitled to payment. The Government should be able to say that they are interested in fair and reasonable remuneration. We are interested that the courts are incompetent to deal with remuneration of any kind or the disbursement of public funds. Therefore, we shall get rid of this abominable situation for ever.

I have to thank the Minister for occasionally being graceful. I regret that his track record deteriorated as the night went on.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time and passed, with amendments.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

That the draft Weights and Measures Act 1963 (Miscellaneous Foods) (Amendment) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 30th June, be approved—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Question agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That Standing Order No. 6 (Arrangement of public business) shall have effect for this Session with the following modifications, namely, in paragraph (2)(b) the words 'not more than two' shall be substituted for the word 'one' in line 20 and the word 'four' shall be substituted for the word 'two' in line 22.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.12 am

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Earlier this evening I thought it wise to look to see what the import of the motion was and I went to the Table to obtain a copy of the Standing Orders as they relate to public business. I was surprised and disappointed to discover, having looked at the Standing Orders and some odd sheets of paper that were included in them, that the Standing Orders are not up to date. They do not take into account the amendments passed by the House, which the Vote Office was kind enough to supply me.

About half an hour later I happened to be in the Library and, quite by chance, near where I was looking for a book, I found the Library copy of the Standing Orders, and again found that they did not include the up-to-date amendments. I should be grateful—I hope that it does not affect other hon. Members now — if you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would ensure, through the appropriate channels, that the copies of the Standing Orders of the House, which may be needed by hon. Members at short notice, are up to date at all material times, and that in other parts of the House, to which hon. Members and others have access, we again have up-to-date bound copies and do not have to rely on an insert being available somewhere or not being available at all?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I shall take note of that and see that appropriate action is taken.

Question put and agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question proposed.

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 16th July, the Motion in the name of Mr. John Biffen relating to Office, Secretarial and Research Allowance may be proceeded with, though opposed, until half-past Eleven o'clock or for one and a half hours after it has been entered upon, whichever is the later, and if proceedings thereon have not been disposed of by that hour Mr. Speaker shall put the Question on any Amendment which may have been moved, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any other Amendments selected by him which may then be moved, and on the Main Question or the Main Question, as amended.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.13 am

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It does not appear that this matter has to be decided forthwith, and I seek your guidance on whether that is the case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): If there is any opposition to the motion, we cannot take it.

Mr. Hughes: It is not so much opposition as a point on the motion, which I understand is debatable.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It cannot be taken now, if opposed.

Mr. Hughes: In which case, I oppose it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Objection taken.

Residential Homes (Borders Region)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.18 am

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I rise under Standing Order No. 1 to raise the subject of cuts in capital provision for residential homes in the Borders region. At this late hour, my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) and myself wish to detain the House to discuss this important subject which affects the local authorities in our respective and joined constituencies.

Local authorities such as the Borders regional council require Scottish Office approval before incurring liability for capital expenditure. That system of financial planning has been in operation since 1977 and under that scheme local authorities submit, as no doubt the House knows, five-year capital plans for approval. Allocations under the scheme are usually sanctioned each January and at that time provisional allocations are issued to cover the two following years.

I understand that a limited flexibility is built into that system, which has been in operation since 1977. For example, I am aware that councils may carry forward up to 10 per cent. of capital allocation underspent in any given year. I understand, too, that they can always realise assets that they own, or vary programmes within their overall capital allocation by up to a factor of 10 per cent. That system is well known and understood by councillors and officials in the Borders region.

The principal complaint of my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale and myself—and our main reason for raising the subject—is that earlier this year the Government, unilaterally and without warning, cut the Borders region's capital allocation under the social work heading for 1986-87 from £550,000 to £350,000—a reduction of about 36 per cent. To date, the Government have refused to reconsider that decision.

Of course, we understand that provisional allocations are sometimes varied—they are usually varied upwards —but the Minister must agree that 36 per cent. is an unusual if not unprecedented cut in a capital allocation.

The Borders regional council, operating under the assumption that £550,000 of capital would be at its disposal in the current fiscal year, set out a programme stretching over a number of years and totalling £3·3 million to replace four outdated homes for the elderly. The phasing of that programme deliberately sought to take full account of the Government's financial constraints. The council's plans set out to replace the existing Victorian mansions, which we all realise are unsuitable as modern residential accommodation for elderly people, one at a time—not one every year or anything more ambitious. A proposal to replace them at a faster rate could easily be justified in terms of need, but that would be impossible to contemplate under the Government's strict financial regime.

The council proposes to rebuild and replace the Peelwalls home in Ayton, Berwickshire, and to build a new home in Jedburgh to accommodate residents from the Milfield home in Jedburgh and from Romany house in Yetholm. It also proposes to rebuild Wellwood in Selkirk in my right hon. Friend's constituency.

There are compelling reasons for replacing those homes as a matter of urgency. First, the majority of bedrooms accommodate up to three or four beds in each room. Secondly, the lack of proximity to toilet facilities requires residents to resort to commodes during the night, causing a great deal of embarrassment to themselves and inconvenience to those with whom they share rooms. The only privacy that can be found in the existing premises is behind the locked door of a toilet. The fact that most existing buildings are multi-level premises means that residents who are old and infirm have to negotiate steps which are a hazard to frail elderly people.

Residents are looked after by a band of dedicated staff, but they are extremely restricted by the stifling physical constraints and the council takes the view—with which I agree — that going for a more modest capital programme, which would be restricted to improving existing buildings would be futile and, in the long term, a waste of public funds. The existing disadvantages can be remedied effectively only by new buildings, custom-built to the new designs and standards that provide a pleasant environment and allow the elderly to be looked after more sympathetically. A striking example of what can be achieved can be seen at the council's new Waverley home at Galashiels.

The planned replacements would provide single room accommodation for every resident, which would allow social relationships to be established at will in the common lounges and sitting rooms, while maintaining independence and privacy in each bedroom. It is striking to note how residents can respond much more positively when they are allowed to do as much for themselves as they are able and want to do. The quality of life for those elderly people can become infinitely higher.

In addition to the new opportunities open to residents in the new custom-designed homes, the kitchens would provide meals on wheels for old people living in their own homes within a wide catchment area and a more extensive warden service as well as day-care facilities. Not only are old people's homes at stake, but new centres and public facilities to serve a community wider than that of the residents.

The plans were at an advanced and detailed stage. They have been knocked on the head. The best that can be said is that there is continuing uncertainty as a direct result of the cut announced by the Government earlier this year. The cut in the Borders region social work provision was the biggest cut in Scotland, except for Tayside, which suffered a cut of 39 per cent.

All these difficulties are compounded by the fact that the Borders region social work allocation for future years shows that the region will be forced to abandon its homes replacement programme. If that happens it will be a tragedy. Many elderly residents will be condemned to end their days without any basic dignity or privacy. They will be denied the accommodation that will give them the chance to retain independence within a residential home for as long as they are physically able.

The Minister will argue that the Borders region has done relatively well. The figures that he will advance to justify that claim were drawn from a straight population count. He must recognise that social work programmes are not provided for the general public, but for target groups. In the Borders region the budget is almost exclusively used to provide for the needs of the elderly. The Borders region has a high proportion of elderly people compared with other regions. That is not reflected in section 94 capital allocations. If capital allocations were drawn within a range of factors, including population, but not exclusively population, the region would merit a larger allocation. The current plans envisage that one home should be rebuilt every three years. That is not an ambitious target. To deny the region the capital resources to carry out that programme is politically perverse.

The Minister has to realise that for a small, extremely responsible and prudent authority such as the Borders region, a cut of this magnitude makes total nonsense of any concept of long-term planning. The whole system of capital allocations requires urgent review. More notice must be given of changes of this magnitude in provisional plans. There is scope for more flexibility within the capital budget allocated to local authorities. The Government must take a more relaxed view about what might be borrowed. That is long overdue.

Will the Minister consider a further application during this financial year? A sum of £90,000 to £100,000 this year would keep the original capital plans on course. If he cannot give that assurance tonight, will he make a clear commitment that he will instruct his Department to devise a scheme of finance, by the autumn of this year, for guidelines for the fiscal years 1987-88 and 1988-89 that will enable the homes to be replaced, even if that takes longer than originally planned? Nothing else will do.

2.30 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I am glad to have the opportunity to reply to the points which the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) has raised on behalf of the senior citizens of his constituency and the Borders regional council which is responsible for their care.

I should apologise for keeping the hon. Gentleman until this time of night, but his hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) had just as much a part to play in keeping us here until this time. The redeeming feature is that I had to stay anyway, so that makes it easier for me to answer an Adjournment debate at this hour.

I welcome the opportunity because it enables me to explain the Government's policy on capital allocations to local authorities and the methods used to determine these allocations generally and in the particular case of the Borders. It seems to me that in his understandable concern about the problems currently besetting the regional council's social work building programme the hon. Member may not have fully appreciated the detailed considerations upon which its capital allocation for 1986-87 was decided. As a consequence he has laid the blame for these difficulties entirely at the door of the Government. I hope to show, in the time available to me, that that is not the true position.

Before I put all the facts before the House, let me first set the wider scene. The Government's consistent and continuing policy is that recovery of the economy should be led by investment in the private sector. Our overall economic strategy therefore embodies a firm commitment to the control of public expenditure. This in turn means that provision for local authority capital expenditure must be contained within the level of resources which the Government consider it appropriate for local authorities to consume. It is nevertheless our stated aim, so far as resources permit, to issue capital allocations which allow authorities to proceed with those projects to which they attach a priority. That is the approach we adopted in deciding the allocations for 1986-87. Of course, it is the approach we adopt in all matters of public spending, not just social work. I can hardly let this evening pass without mentioning the considerable amount of capital which has been given to the Borders health board in order to build a brand new hospital. I was pleased to go and lay the foundation stone to show that Conservative Governments do care and that they put capital expenditure into health and social work.

It would perhaps promote a better general understanding of how decisions are made and the great care that is taken to ensure fair treatment for all authorities and all programmes if I were to explain briefly the various steps which lead to the issues of final allocations. Capital allocations for each programme in local authorities' financial plans are issued in January or February of each year, when authorities are given a final allocation giving formal consent to capital expenditure in the forthcoming financial year and provisional allocations for the two years thereafter.

Towards the end of his contribution, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire was suggesting that we should look further ahead than the immediate financial year and the two years thereafter. If we did more than that we would have to do similar for the whole Government programme. One could not have part of the programme rolling for five years and have the main part of the programme, the total amount of capital available which is laid down by the Treasury in discussion with Ministers, rolling for only three years.

As I have already indicated, the allocations were not plucked out of the air. They were the result of a most careful scrutiny of all authorities' financial plans and a detailed assessment of their relative needs, as distinct from desires, for new and improved buildings. It was recognised that needs varied from one region to another by virtue of factors other than the purely demographic, as has long been acknowledged in the arrangements for the distribution of rate support grant. One such factor is the state and extent of the provision already present on the ground by reference to the building stock survey, while others include the varying approaches of authorities to programme planning ad their past performance in the use of the resources made available to them. That is an important factor to which I shall return.

All these factors having been taken into account authority by authority, it was decided that the final allocation to the Borders region social work captial programme for 1986-87 should be £350,000. This was significantly less than the final allocation of £695,000 for 1985-86 and the provisional allocation of £550,000, which was given for 1986-87, which had been notified to the Borders regional authority in February 1985. Other authorities were, likewise, faced with substantial reductions on their provisional allocations.

It is fair to point out, however, that the allocations made to the smaller authorities have tended to vary from year to year by more than the average and that the Borders have over the piece been treated very favourably in relation to their share of the total Scottish population. Even the reduced allocation was higher than would have been the case if it had been based solely on population. The reason for that was the higher than average elderly population in the region, which has 2·5 per cent. of the Scottish population over 75 years as against 2 per cent. of the Scottish population of all ages. I can assure the hon. Member that his suggestion, if I heard him aright, that the disproportionate number of elderly people in the Borders was not taken into account is untrue. That factor is taken into account. Indeed, the Borders regional council, in comparison to other areas in Scotland, have been reasonably favourably treated.

Provisional allocations for 1986-87 at cash prices were first issued to local authorities as far back as 26 January 1984 and revised provisional allocations were notified on 15 February 1985. Provisional allocations for 1987-88 were also issued at the same time. In July 1985 local authorities were asked to prepare their financial plans for 1986-87 and later years on the basis of the provisional allocations and to submit the plans to my office, and for other expenditure, to the Scottish Office in general, by 31 October 1985. It is not until the plans are received and studied in depth that sufficient hard information is available for the purpose of fixing the final allocations. Final allocations for 1986-87, this financial year, were eventually issued on 13 February of this year.

As a result of decisions taken in the 1985 public expenditure survey, the amount available for final allocation to authorities as capital consents in this area was £14·77 million. Allocations may be enhanced by any capital receipts raised. Of course, local authorities can keep the capital receipts. It was clear from the declared levels of legal commitments of around £10 million shown in financial plans that most authorities were going to have limited scope for developing their programmes in 1986-87. I appreciate that many authorities, including Borders regional council, consider that their allocations fall some way short of their aspirations. If, everyone had the resources to match his ambitions it would be a happy world, but that is not the world of reality. In reaching our decisions for 1986-87 we had to work strictly within the overall level of resources available. If one budget receives more resources than another, it does so at the expense of other budgets or at the expense of an increase in the total amount spent by the public sector. I know that many seem to think that the promise that they make in one instance can be separated from the promise that they make in another, and that no one is allowed to calculate total expenditure. Again, that is not the real world. The total spent has to be taken out of the amount of capital that is available within the overall economy. As I have said, we believe that it is important that as much investment as possible in our economy goes into the productive private sector, and that the demands of the state sector, which in many ways can be infinite, are kept strictly under control in terms of what the taxpayer and the economy can afford.

There is a second factor to which I have already referred when talking about taking into account past performance in the use of resources made available. In each of the three years from 1983-84 to 1985-86, the Borders regional council has been unable to make full use of the resources allocated to its social work programme. Authorities are allowed to transfer up to 10 per cent. of their allocation from one programme to another within the non-housing block, and the record shows that over the three years in question the Borders regional council exercised this discretion to the full to transfer a total of £177,500 out of its social work building programme and into its education, water and sewerage programmes. In the light of this information, hon. Members may consider that the cut in the allocation for 1986-87 was perhaps rather less unreasonable and unpredictable than they have been led to believe. Over the preceding three years, in the light of the allocations given by my office to the Borders for social work capital expenditure, the regional council itself decided that £177,500 should be transferred from that programme to other programmes.

In its financial plan for the five years from 1986-87, the regional council has stated that its policy is to maintain elderly people in the community for as long as possible by providing a variety of domiciliary and day-care services. Further provision of residential accommodation for the elderly on any appreciable scale is not envisaged, but the capital programme anticipates the need to modify existing buildings, taking into account their age and condition, and to replace existing residential accommodation with suitable buildings only where necessary. These buildings will incorporate day care facilities. I am in broad agreement with that policy. Indeed, on many occasions I have visited the Borders and I have been impressed with the work carried out by the Borders regional council. There is a plaque in one of the homes which states that I opened the home. My name appears on a plaque on the foundation stone marking the beginnings of a hospital. I look forward to being invited to the opening of that hospital in my capacity as Minister after the next election.

In line with the Government's aim of allowing authorities, as far as possible, to proceed with priority projects, the regional council's capital allocation for 1986-87 was pitched at a level which would cover all legally committed expenditure and would allow completion of Deanfield old people's home in Hawick and a start to be made on either a new home for the elderly in Eyemouth which is urgently needed to replace the outmoded and inadequate Peelwalls home in Ayton, Berwickshire, or a new day centre at Coldstream. Completion of the Hawick project, involving expenditure of £198,000 in 1986-87, was scheduled for June 1986.

It is worth stating that the total capital value of the Hawick project which will be spread over several financial years, amounts to almost £1 million. That shows that the project is substantial. Had that project maintained its schedule, work on another project would have been able to go ahead as planned. However, in the event, work on Deanfield was substantially set back by the failure of the main contractor. The effect of this is the inevitable carry forward of commitment into the current financial year and, unfortunately, a probable increase in the 1986-87 expenditure on the Deanfield project to more than £415,000. I must make it clear, however, that this difficulty was not known to my Department when the council's final allocation was being considered and there is therefore no provision for it in the allocation. Indeed, the authority did not inform my Department of the problem and position of Deanfield old people's home until some weeks after the allocation had been issued.

Officials of the Scottish Education Department's social work services group met representatives of the council on 17 April to discuss the problem. At the meeting, the council's representatives stressed the difficulties of managing a small building programme in the face of the major upset posed by the contractor's liquidation, and estimated that additional allocation of around £100,000 would be needed to help meet the extra commitment carried forward to 1986-87. My officials, while they sympathised with the council's predicament, had no option but to explain that there was no possibility of the present allocation being increased meantime. That is a view with which I wholly agree.

I must tell the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire that there is no possibility that the present allocation can be increased meantime, despite the problem which I fully understand about Deanfield and the additional expenditure. All resources available for capital allocation in 1986-87 were issued in February, and, unless there were to be considerable underspending by some authorities, no increase in allocation can be made during the year. It is unlikely that there will such underspending —certainly not of the order that would be necessary to release the amount of money required to come to the aid of the Borders regional council. There is not much hope from that source.

The Government have advised the council to continue to plan its expenditure within its present allocation, enhanced by any capital receipts applied to the social work programme. That means that the council can keep the proceeds of any capital receipts and use them. In this case, I suggest that it can use them to help with the problem in the social work programme. It can also take advantage of the flexibility arrangements afforded by the capital control scheme. They include the carrying forward of underspend from the previous year; anticipation of capital consent from the following year; and interprogramme transfer of capital consent from the current year. During the past three years, Borders regional council has used that facility to take £177,500 out of the social work capital budget and put it into other budgets. So it is well aware of the procedure and, from the experience of the past three years, is well able to carry it out. The council must examine some of its other programmes to see whether it can take some money from them and, by the interprogramme transfer method, move that money into the social work budget.

My calculations suggest that if the council took maximum advantage of all those mechanisms, it could make available sufficient resources in this financial year, 1986-87, to meet the increased Deanfield commitment and other non-specified legally committed expenditure. Unfortunately, it does not offer a solution to the problem of a delay in the start of work on the Peelwalls project, which I understand the authority has identified as a priority. I fully understand that point. Having considered that project and the scheme at Coldstream, I appreciate why the council has given priority to the Peelwalls project. I appreciate, equally, that it would not have been an easy decision. No decision about priorities is easy.

The day centre is nearer fruition, and makes provision for the elderly in a locality which has two new sheltered housing complexes and a generally high proportion of old people in the population. However, it could be slotted into the building programme at any time. I understand the need for Peelwalls to be replaced. It is a Georgian mansion three quarters of a mile from the village of Ayton, which I remember well from my student days. It is not suitable for the purpose. As the hon. Gentleman said, there is multiple occupancy of rooms, it has no lifts, there are inadequate and inaccessible toilets and it has an unsatisfactory kitchen.

The problem has occurred because of the wholly unforeseen circumstances of Deanfield, not because of the capital allocation. Even in its reduced, final form, the capital allocation was sufficient to go ahead with Deanfield and to allow the project at Peelwalls to progress. The council has now put forward to the social work services group a detailed case for special treatment against the possibility, however remote, that supplementary allocations may be possible later in the year. The information provided will be taken into account in determining——

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

Mr. Denzil Davies: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It is very unusual to have a point of order at the beginning of Question Time.

Mr. Davies: I merely ask your guidance, Mr. Speaker. I notice that questions Nos. 5 and 13 are to be taken at the end of Question Time, and not in the usual order. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, or the Government Front Bench, the reason for this? If these are run of the mill questions, the answers should be given in the proper place. If the answers are important, why are we not getting a proper statement at the end of Question Time? I ask this question because, on another occasion, the Secretary of State for Defence tried to avoid making a statement on the ordnance factories. We want to know what is going on.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is a matter for the Government whether questions are taken at the end. It may be that we would not have reached question No. 13.

Rolls-Royce Aero Engines

1. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the future procurement by his Department of Rolls-Royce aero engines, and engines in which Rolls-Royce plc has a participation, over the next five years.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): Over the next five years the Department foresees continuing purchases of RB 199, Pegasus, Gnome and Gem engines in sufficient quantities to meet the requirements of the services.

Mr. Stern: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that, on the military side, the company's order book, especially because of its own efforts in obtaining export orders, has never looked healthier? My hon. Friend's answer will give confidence to the work force and the management in looking forward to the continued prosperity of the company when it is privatised.

Mr. Lee: As the Rolls-Royce, Barnoldswick factory is in my constituency, I am especially proud of the achievements which have been made by Rolls-Royce during the past few years. Privatisation is, of course, a matter for the Department of Trade and Industry, but I understand that it is intended that the flotation will take place during the first half of 1987. Defence orders will play a considerable part in that flotation.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Will the Minister say something about the RTM 322 helicopter engine? Will he also consider doing something about new engines and prop jet engines, as is being done at NASA for the Americans?

Mr. Lee: The RTM 322 is being developed by Rolls-Royce and Turbo Meca. It is a mainly private venture operation. It is a contender for the EH101, but at present no decisions have been taken.

Mr. Hayward: Would not the prospects for Rolls-Royce after privatisation both in Britain and abroad be further improved if orders could be gained for a super Pegasus engine, which is currently being developed at Filton?

Mr. Lee: There is a Rolls-Royce initiative to uprate the GR5 Pegasus engine. Although there is a formal requirement for this at the present time, we are attracted by its lower life-cycle costs and better performance. We are looking at it in conjunction with the United States marine corps.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will my hon. Friend explain the position vis-a-vis funding from his Department for the XG40 programme, which we hope will be the basis for the new engine for the European fighter aircraft?

Mr. Lee: I cannot give a precise answer at this stage, but I shall endeavour to write to my hon. Friend.

Willsworthy Shooting Range

2. Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to notify the Dartmoor national park committee of his proposals to replace buildings at the Willsworthy shooting range.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Roger Freeman): We shall consult the committee immediately should we decide that we wish to proceed with the replacement of Willsworthy camp. At present we are still considering the proposal.

Sir Peter Mills: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that it would be wrong to build a barracks on Dartmoor? It is not essential to build a barracks there. The troops can be bussed to the moor quite easily. I am not opposed to the Royal Artillery being in the area; it is simply that it seems quite wrong to build a barracks on Dartmoor.

Mr. Freeman: I understand my hon. Friend's concern. The Army has been on Dartmoor for almost 100 years. We are talking about the replacement not of barracks but of temporary accommodation. Because I understand my hon. Friend's concern, I look forward to visiting Dartmoor in September. I hope that I can find a convenient date to go there with him.

Mr. Steen: I think that the House owes a deep debt of gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills), whose love of Dartmoor is well known. It is not just a question of a few shacks on Dartmoor. I am told that it will be a multi-storey, mixed sex barracks. It will be two or three miles within the Dartmoor national park. In view of the fact that the Ministry of Defence is exempt from planning consent, it is quite wrong for the Minister to collude and allow the Ministry to destroy the boundaries of the national park by building a barracks in the way proposed.

Mr. Freeman: I think that my hon. Friend knows a lot more about the plans than I do. No plans have been finalised. As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills), I am undertaking to go to Dartmoor in September to look at that site and all possible sites.

South Africa

3. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any members of the South African armed forces are currently receiving training in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Freeman: No.

Mr. Flannery: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that welcome answer. Will he give an assurance that the policy that he has just stated and which was stated by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), on behalf of the Labour Government in 1976, will carry on in a most determined way?

Mr. Freeman: I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. Since 1976, under successive Governments, there has been no military co-operation with and no military training for South African military personnel in this country. There is no military co-operation between the two countries.

Sir Antony Buck: Does my hon. Friend agree that there might be something to be said for South Africans coming here, to see how training is conducted on an entirely non-racist basis?

Mr. Freeman: My hon. and learned Friend makes an intriguing point. I confirm that for the past 10 years our policy has been and will continue to be one of no military co-operation between the two countries.

Mr. Stokes: Does my hon. Friend agree that it might be an admirable idea for South African forces to be trained in this country? It is in the interests of the West and of our own nation that South Africa should have a Government friendly to the West, safeguarding the Cape route and taking care of the valuable minerals there. Surely, none of us wants a Communist Government in that part of the world.

Mr. Freeman: I am somewhat disappointed by my hon. Friend. I repeat that our policy is and will remain one of no military co-operation between this country and the Government of South Africa.

Pakistan (Frigates)

4. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will report on the outcome of his visit to Pakistan in relation to the sale of frigates.

Mr. Lee: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has not been to Pakistan.

Mr. Chope: Is my hon. Friend aware that when I put down the question two weeks ago, a visit was expected within a few days? Does he realise how vital it is for the people of Southampton that the order for type 21 frigates is won in Pakistan? Does he accept that the only way to win the order is for a Minister to go to Pakistan and tie up the final negotiations? Can my hon. Friend assure me that a Minister will visit Pakistan before the end of the month?

Mr. Lee: I fully understand my hon. Friend's concern for Vospers. It is a delicate matter. Negotiations are continuing. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that the former Minister of State for Defence Procurement visited Pakistan in support of the order in November 1985. A further ministerial visit is under active discussion.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Besides the export potential of frigates, the Minister will be concerned with the export potential of their accompanying fleet auxiliaries. Can he now perhaps explain why the Harland and Wolff designs for our premier fleet auxiliary the AOR 1 were said in the House in April to have been comprehensively costed, yet, as we were told only a week ago, are still being reviewed by the Ministry of Defence?

Mr. Lee: I believe that this matter has been explained to the appropriate House of Commons Committee. Swan Hunter will be provided with the basic Harland and Wolff tender package at the end of August. That is now being examined to ensure that information given in commercial confidence to Harland and Wolff is not passed on to Swan Hunter. If Swan Hunter indicates on the basis of the basic tender that it is interested in tendering, it will be given detailed design drawings by January 1987 to enable it to provide a meaningful tender.

Mr. Franks: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of the export history of Vickers Shipbuilders and Engineering to the Indian subcontinent. May I renew the invitation, which I gave to the Secretary of State on his appointment to that office, to visit Barrow and see, not only the shipyards, but the engineering parts of the complex?

Mr. Lee: My hon. Friend never fails to get in a plug for the Vickers yard in his constituency, and we fully expect that to continue. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence heard his point, and I am sure that he will be visiting Vickers relatively soon.

Mr. Janner: The Minister referred to the delicate negotiations with Pakistan. Has he also taken into account the other delicacy, which is relations with India and the anxieties in India over the build-up of armaments by Pakistan? What arrangements, if any, are being made for consultations with India in respect of armaments in that area?

Mr. Lee: Obviously, we have ongoing business and relationships with both Pakistan and India. I draw the hon. and learned Gentleman's attention to the fact that recently we sold Hermes to India.

Mr. Viggers: Ministry of Defence efforts in Pakistan and, indeed, Greece are greatly appreciated, but is my hon. Friend aware that the first question asked by any prospective purchaser is whether the Royal Navy has placed orders with the yard in question? In that connection, will my hon. Friend ensure that Vosper Thornycroft is always given fair consideration for Royal Navy orders?

Mr. Lee: I am happy to give my hon. Friend that assurance.

North Atlantic Treaty Organisation

7. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the promotion of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation was last discussed at a Defence Planning Committee meeting.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): Questions related to the need to explain and encourage public support for NATO policies are frequently discussed at Defence Planning Committee and North Atlantic Council meetings.

Mr. Lawler: Is my right hon. Friend not concerned that young people in particular are subject to large amounts of anti-NATO and anti-nuclear propaganda, increasingly under the guise of peace studies, and that, for example, the public perception would be that the NATO nuclear stockpile is not at its lowest level for 20 years, as is the case, but that it is probably at its highest? Should not NATO be doing more to inform the public of its role in the peace movement?

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. Friend that a great deal more could be done to bring home to many people, especially young people, the importance of the NATO Alliance, which is absolutely essential for the whole posture of our defence policy. On promoting the importance of NATO, it is up to NATO, which has a budget for this purpose, and individual members, such as the United Kingdom, to do all they can in that regard. I certainly assure my hon. Friend that I shall do all I can to forward that.

Mr. Marlow: What would happen to NATO if the Labour party kicked out the Americans from their bases in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend has hit on an extremely serious possibility, but he may agree that the prospect of that happening is rather remote. However, if it did, I would feel extremely worried about how the general public in America would react and what the effect of that would be on the Alliance thereafter.

Sir Antony Buck: Does my right hon. Friend agree that perhaps more should be done, literally on a NATO basis, to put forward the NATO cause in partnership with what is done by individual NATO countries? Could not the NATO defence college do more than it is doing to spread what might be described as the NATO cause?

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend that perhaps more should be done by NATO. The NATO press and information service, which works closely with Government information services, maintains an active programme of films, audio visual productions, seminars and visits. My hon. and learned Friend might be interested to know that in 1985 no fewer than 76 groups from the United Kingdom visited NATO, and 60 groups have visited NATO so far this year. NATO is far from being inactive in this area, but I am sure that it could do more.

RAF Cottesmore

8. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Defence whether he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent noise survey taken near RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: It will take some time to evaluate the results of the noise survey. It is therefore too early to say which villages or how many additional houses will qualify for grant assistance when the improved scheme is applied at RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Latham: I thank my hon. Friend for arranging for the second survey to be carried out, but will he drastically speed up this exercise? It is impossible for my constituents to understand why this exercise should take so long. Surely it could be sorted out in a week or so?

Mr. Freeman: I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that the improvements to the scheme that I announced last November must be welcomed by his constituents. However, it will take a little time to cover the 50 or so airfields which the improved scheme will benefit. I assure my hon. Friend that we will make haste as quickly as we possibly can.

Home Defence

9. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to extend the role of volunteers in home defence.

Mr. Freeman: Current planning already envisages a continuing expansion of our reserve forces for home defence tasks.

Mr. Thompson: Bearing in mind the well-known need to secure the home base more effectively in an emergency, does my hon. Friend agree that it might be a good idea to introduce some form of voluntary national service for young people to supplement the good work carried out by the reserve and home defence volunteers?

Mr. Freeman: My hon. Friend raises a different point. He will know that, in relation to home defence, we have plans for a Home Defence Force of approximately 5,000 by 1990, and we intend to increase the Territorial Army. Within that time frame to 1990, that is the correct policy and plan to ensure national security.

Mr. Ron Brown: Does the Minister agree that within the Conservative party there are elements who would argue that the so-called Home Defence Force could be used as strike breakers to attack the working class and hold them down in periods of struggle against the Government?

Mr. Freeman: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the Home Service Force, not the Home Defence Force. The Home Service Force is currently 3,100 strong and has some way to go before it reaches its target ceiling. Its main function is simply the defence of key installations.

Mr. Jim Spicer: Does my hon. Friend accept that, even with these forces allocated to protect key installations, and even when they are at full strength, they must be kept under review because there may be a need to extend the number of key installations to guard?

Mr. Freeman: My hon. Friend is correct. I am grateful for his continuing interest in home defence. When we reach the target levels, that will be the right time to review policy to see whether there is the correct balance of commitments within the balance of resources. We will then review policy.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: As an ex-local defence volunteer, Home Guard and an ex-Regular Army man, may I ask the Minister to confirm that the defence force in its reserve capacity—the Territorial Army and the Home Defence Force—is probably the best value for money available? Would my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown) accept from me that he was very uncomplimentary to the many thousands of decent working-class men and women who are members of those forces when he suggested that they join to become strike breakers?

Mr. Freeman: I share the hon. Gentleman's views about the value of the Territorial Army. I join him in paying tribute to the TA for its excellent work.

Mr. Churchill: Will my hon. Friend confirm that a ministerial undertaking was given to the Select Committee on Defence that the 300,000 or more self-loading rifles which have now become surplus to requirements for the Regular forces will not be disposed of, but will be retained against the possibility that we may have to expand greatly the Home Services Forces in future?

Mr. Freeman: If my hon. Friend will permit me, I shall write to him with the answer to that question.

Sir Hector Monro: In view of the great success of the Royal Auxiliary Air Force in aerodrome defence and recruiting, is my hon. Friend able to announce a helicopter squadron for the Auxiliaries, which is long overdue?

Mr. Freeman: No, I am not yet able to make any announcement. It is not within my direct responsibilities, in any case. However, I join my hon. Friend in paying tribue to the Royal Auxiliary Air Force Reserve, which, as with the Territorial Army, performs an excellent job.

Services (Premature Voluntary Retirement)

10. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to receive the results of his Department's studies into the reasons for premature voluntary outflow from the services.

Mr. Freeman: The Ministry of Defence takes a continuing interest in the reasons for premature voluntary outflow. As part of that process a number of specific studies are currently under way and results are expected to become available by about the end of the year.

Mr. Cartwright: Is the Minister aware of the view of a number of senior officers that one major cause of the worrying outflow of skilled and experienced personnel is that our armed forces are overstretched and are being asked to do too much with limited resources, which has an adverse impact on the personal lives of the service men concerned? If that turns out to be a factor, what will the Government do to put it right?

Mr. Freeman: Obviously, by its nature, service life is turbulent, but we are conducting thorough reviews. There is a new form of questionnaire for those seeking premature voluntary retirement. When we have those results, which I hope will be accurate, we shall be able to judge the reasons—there may be more than one—for premature voluntary outflow.

Mr. Duffy: Is the Minister aware that the overstretch to which the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) referred is particularly evident in the Royal Navy, where ships are now putting in more sea time than in world war 2 and the 1930s? Does that not point to the urgent need for replacement ships, apart from additional surface ships, because they are a good deal less labour-intensive?

Mr. Freeman: The PVR figures, particularly for the Royal Navy, show that there is some levelling off. There might even be some early evidence of improvement. The PVR figures for this year are considerably below those for 1978-79, when the previous Government suspended pay comparability.

Sir David Price: Is it not an excellent thing, if the supplementary questions are correct, that the services are being stretched? Is not that what service life is about? Is not the best way of simulating wartime conditions to stretch the services, and does it not show that peacetime soldiering is not an idle occupation?

Mr. Freeman: As I have said, when the results of the study are available we shall be able to judge what the reasons are—there may be more than one—for the current PVR rate.

Mr. Allen McKay: Does the Minister accept that the present formulation of Falklands pay is less than helpful in the retention of the men in all three services? Will he repeal the formula and make Falklands pay from day one, as it should be?

Mr. Freeman: Since 1979 the Government have accepted and implemented all the Armed Forces Pay Review Body recommendations. Our experience is that armed forces personnel in all three services and at all levels greatly appreciate what the Government have done with regard to pay.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that at times when the civil airlines are in the market for pilots, the Royal Air Force has traditionally lost a substantial number of trained personnel to those airlines, and that we are now in such a situation? Could not those highly skilled, trained people who are going out to the civil airlines be used by the Royal Air Force to its advantage if they were kept in an auxiliary or reserve flying role?

Mr. Freeman: My hon. Friend is right. He has put his finger on the problem. The problem has been continuing for a considerable time, but we are studying it.

Mr. Dubs: Given the signs of racial discrimination in the British Army——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Rubbish.

Mr. Dubs: It is not rubbish—will the Minister look carefully to see whether it is likely that black soldiers are leaving the Army early because they are not given the same opportunities for promotion as their white contemporaries?

Mr. Freeman: That is pure speculation. The policy of the Government, which has been consistent under different Administrations, is that racial discrimination is not tolerated. That is the Government's clear and firm policy.

Mr. Wallace: Are not the lack of resources to which my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) referred affecting the ability of many of our service men to exercise as fully as possible? Is it not having a damaging effect on morale? Is it not the case that, until the Secretary of State and his Ministers face up to the budgetary crisis in the Ministry of Defence, those problems will not be solved or go away?

Mr. Freeman: I do not share the premise of the hon. Gentleman's argument. I do not believe, and there is no evidence to show, that our armed forces are prevented from exercising properly.

Mr. Wilkinson: Further to the serious point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), is not the continuing loss to the flying service of fast jet pilots a great economic loss to the nation, because they are trained at £3 million apiece? Is it not about time that an effective flying role was found for them in the Royal Auxiliary Air Force, as is the case with the Air National Guard in the United States reserve?

Mr. Freeman: My hon. Friend has made a valid point. The loss of our pilots to the civil airlines is of some concern, but we should not get it out of proportion. We are looking at the problem.

Defence Projects

12. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Defence what defence procurement projects of a value greater than £10 million are at present running behind schedule.

Mr. Lee: The Ministry has a well-developed system which ensures that all projects running seriously behind schedule are brought to the notice of senior officials and, for major projects, Ministers. Information about major projects is also regularly made available to the Public Accounts and Defence Select Committees. The detailed information requested, however, would require a special survey and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Carlile: Bearing in mind the Government's decision to cut defence spending in real terms and the escalating cost of Trident — one national newspaper, normally friendly to the Government, recently called it the "cuckoo in the nest" — will the hon. Gentleman now come clean and tell us which of the smaller projects are likely to be abandoned?

Mr. Lee: I am surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman is here. I should have thought that he would be campaigning in the by-election and endeavouring to explain the inconsistencies of, and to fill the gaps in, the alliance's defence policy. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman was on dangerous ground in talking about Trident. It is by no means the "cuckoo in the nest". One must compare like with like. Over a 20-year period the cost of Trident was just under £10 billion, compared with the escalating cost of the British Army of the Rhine, which, over that same period, was no less than £46 billion.

Mr. Favell: While on the subject of long-running sagas, will my hon. Friend update the position of the Nimrod AEW programme? Will he tell the House that British Aerospace has had nothing whatsoever to do with that sorry saga and that it has performed well and delivered on time?

Mr. Lee: I acknowledge that we have had some horrors in our procurement programme. Seven bids were received on 7 July, from Airship Industries, Boeing, Grumman, Lockheed, GEC, MEL and Pilatus Britten Norman. A decision will be taken in the autumn. I am pleased to confirm that we were happy with the airframe part of Nimrod, which was constructed by British Aerospace.

Mr. Douglas: Notwithstanding his answer, will the Minister say whether the C130 frame might be used——

An Hon. Member: Is this a question?

Mr. Douglas: If the hon. Gentleman would clean his ears out, he would have heard me say "will the Minister". Will the Minister say whether the C130 frame might be used with the electronic kit for the airborne early warning system?

Mr. Lee: I believe that there is a question on this matter later in the Order Paper. There are many permutations within the seven bids that have been received.

Procurement Policy

14. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards the placing of procurement contracts with British companies.

Mr. Lee: We buy British whenever it is sensible, economic and consistent with our international obligations to do so, and acquire from overseas only when the advantages of cost, performance and time scale outweigh the longer-term benefits of procuring the British alternative. The criteria used in deciding the source of our requirements are set out in the 1983 open government document "Value for Money in Defence Procurement".

Mr. Hayes: I hope that my hon. Friend will be protecting British jobs and British exports in my constituency in the company of Cossor Electronics by throwing out a bid by the American company that is called Bendix, which is using predatory pricing to get a foothold in the British market at the expense of British jobs. When are we to have a British procurement policy.

Mr. Lee: By and large, we have a British procurement policy. We are proud that about 90 to 95 per cent. of total procurement spend is spent with United Kingdom industry. As for the IFF competition, I can assure my hon. Friend that the strong and genuine representations that he has made to Ministry of Defence Ministers on behalf of the important Cossor factory in his constituency will be seriously taken into account, but we have a competition on at present.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May we have an inquiry into the case of Mr. Don Pitman, a former employee of Thorn EMI, who reported his company for making excess profits on defence contracts? May we have a statement also on when the Government intend to reply to the Public Accounts Committee's report on excess profits by defence contractor Aish and Company? Will the principle of compensation, which we have advocated, be accepted by the Government, and will Mr. Smith, who is in deep financial trouble, be compensated fully for laying his job on the line in the way that he did three years ago?

Mr. Lee: I believe that there will be a response to the PAC fairly shortly. I am not aware that any investigation is planned into the case to which the hon. Gentleman referred in the earlier part of his supplementary question.

Mr. Latham: It is highly desirable that we should have the largest possible British procurement programme, but is not the concomitant of that that weapons systems should be delivered on time and to cost? Will he study the reports of the PAC, which make pretty depressing reading?

Mr. Lee: I give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks. We are becoming increasingly a hard-nosed and commercial Department. Many aspects of our procurement policy are being tightened.

Mr. Meadowcroft: What order is about to be placed with the Royal Ordnance factory at Barnbow, Leeds?

Mr. Lee: I believe that the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question relates to another question, but we are giving serious consideration to the seventh Challenger regiment, which I believe the hon. Gentleman is getting at.

Mr. Dickens: Are not British procurement opportunities and production runs being undermined by the French, who are surreptitiously selling helicopters to South Africa in defiance of the United Nations arms embargo?

Mr. Lee: I have no intention of flying with my hon. Friend on that route.

Mr. Denzil Davis: Will the Minister give the assurance that was given to the Committee that considered the Ordnance Factories and Military Services Bill, as it was then, that there is no intention of selling off the ROFs piecemeal in the course of privatisation?

Mr. Lee: I cannot give that assurance. Such an assurance was never given to that Committee, in which the right hon. Gentleman and I were deeply involved. We said that the preferred option for privatisation was a flotation of the whole, but we did not rule out, in certain circumstances, the sale of individual factories. We would much prefer, however, to deal with Royal Ordnance as a whole.

Falkland Islands

16. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total area in acres in the Falkland Islands at present unusable because of Argentine mines.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): The total area in the Falkland Islands presently unusable because of Argentine mines amounts to about 6,440 acres compared with an area of about 3 million acres for the islands as a whole.

Sir John Farr: While I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply, may I ask him whether he is aware that the land in question is accessible to some of the main centres of the Falklands? What discussions are taking place and what evaluation is taking place on how to detect those mines, which I understand are not metallic but are made of plastic?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend is entirely right, in that most of the remaining Argentine mines are concentrated round Port Stanley, which is the main centre of population on the Falkland Islands. During the past year of so, the Ministry of Defence has been carrying out an in-depth research programme, on which about £3 million has already been spent, to try to deal with the problem. So far we have been unable to identify, and even if we spent many millions of pounds more we would be unable to identify, a sufficiently safe way of clearing those mines that could be employed in peace-time. Three Engineers were seriously wounded in the immediate aftermath of the Falklands campaign while trying to clear those mines. My hon. Friend will agree that it would be unjustifiable to risk maiming for life other sappers while trying to deal with the problem.

Nimrod Programme

17. Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations his Department has received from British Aerospace in respect of the Nimrod AEW Mk. III.

Mr. Younger: None, Sir.

Mr. Winterton: Is my right hon. Friend aware that British Aerospace, which is responsible for the airframe of the Nimrod, has in every way honoured its part of the contract and come up to scratch, without any reservation whatsoever? Can my right hon. Friend say that there has been a breakthrough by GEC Avionics, which is responsible for the other part of the contract, and that there is now no chance that the contract, which is so vital to British Aerospace and to British manufacturing industry, will be placed abroad? If it is, it will be a disaster for employment in my constituency and in the areas represented by my hon. Friends the Members for Hazel Grove (Mr. Arnold), for Cheadle (Mr. Normanton) and Stockport (Mr. Favell). Will he assure us that the contract will be British and that he will buy British for the benefit of British employment?

Mr. Younger: I can confirm to my hon. Friend that the work carried out by British Aerospace on the Nimrod AEW Mk III project is well advanced. However, a decision on the future of the project must take into account the implications my hon. Friend mentioned. I shall say no more about the bidders for the contract, as I wish to assess them all on an equal basis. I shall be waiting to see not only the bids that are put in, but the performance of the equipment to which those bids relate.

Mr. O'Neill: Will the Secretary of State assure us that a statement will be made to the House when that decision is taken, that it will not be taken during the recess when hon. Members will have no chance to question him and that there will be a proper statement, not a hole-in-corner operation such as we are getting today in relation to the frigates?

Mr. Younger: I note what the hon. Gentleman says, and I can tell him that it will be some considerable time yet before I am likely to decide on the matter. I note what he says about the necessity of a statement to the House. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will have heard that, and I shall certainly take it into account.

Mr. Leigh: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that whichever company is successful in obtaining the AEW contract, RAF Waddington in Lincolnshire will continue to be used as a base for AEW operations?

Mr. Younger: I cannot give quite such a categorical undertaking, but I appreciate my hon. Friend's strong interest in ensuring that that is so. Such decisions must await the result of the competition, which looks like being a most successful one, for the best equipment to fit the RAF with this important capability.

British Nuclear Test

18. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the recent testing of a British nuclear warhead in the Nevada desert.

Mr. Stanley: A British nuclear device was successfully detonated at the United States Nevada test site on 25 June. The yield was between 20 and 150 kilotons. The test was undertaken with the co-operation of the United States under the auspices of the mutual defence agreement of 1958.

Mr. Evans: Is the Minister aware that in the opinion of the majority of British people the action of exploding that device was outrageous and provocative, especially in the aftermath of the Chernobyl disaster? At a time when Britain's ordinary defence forces are being reduced, why are we wasting money on such outrageous actions?

Mr. Stanley: The hon. Gentleman says that it was outrageous. If he believes that, I hope that he will ask himself why it was that during the time when the negotiations were taking place for a comprehensive test ban treaty under the last Labour Government, that Government detonated British nuclear devices on 11 April 1978 and again on 18 November 1978.

Mr. Strang: What has been the Government's response to the Soviet moratorium on nuclear weapons testing, which has been in operation now for almost a year?

Mr. Stanley: The hon. Gentleman must bear in mind that since 1979 the Soviet Union has undertaken in excess of 150 tests, while the British Government have undertaken only 11.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is no point in having weapons delivery systems unless the warheads fitted to those delivery systems function and do the job for which they are intended, and that there is only one way to find that out, and that is to test them?

Mr. Stanley: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. It is necessary to maintain the effectiveness of our nuclear capability as the test programme takes place. That is exactly the same view as that taken by the Labour Government, as they stated in this House of Commons.

Mr. Denzil Davies: What is the Government's view now on a comprehensive test ban treaty, since both American and Soviet scientists agree that, with the sophisticated seismic equipment available today, it is virtually impossible to conduct an underground test without it being detected? In view of that, why do the Government not now agree to a comprehensive test ban treaty?

Mr. Stanley: As we have said on many previous occasions, that is not the current scientific view of British Government or, indeed. The American Government, and there are still substantial verification problems that have to be overcome.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Miss Boothroyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Miss Boothroyd: Is the right hon. Lady in favour of early majority rule in South Africa on the basis of one-person one-vote, or is she not?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Lady is well aware that the question is not one-person, one-vote — [Interruption.] It might be as well to listen to the end of the sentence first. It is whether it is one-person state one-vote in a unitary state, or a federal state, so the question that she asks is not the correct one.

Mr. Baldry: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the real divide in this country is between those of us who believe that the state should always be the servant of the people and those Opposition Members who want the state always to be the master of the people, and that no playing around with words such as transposing "social ownership" for "nationalisation" will hide that fact from the people of this country?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. Social ownership is nationalisation and control by Government under another name. We want to reduce the control by Government and increase the freedom on the part of the citizens of this country.

Mr. Kinnock: Against the background of last week and, indeed, last weekend why does the Prime Minister keep insisting that sanctions and negotiations are somehow mutually exclusive alternatives when it is obvious to everyone, including many members of her own party, that real negotiations will be secured only when there are strict sanctions against apartheid, and that persuasion without pressure is utterly hopeless?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman uses a new word when he refers to "strict" sanctions; he does not define it. As he will know, his party has rejected general economic sanctions, and every party in power has rejected general economic sanctions for the simple reason that they have never been known to work to bring about internal change. If they will not work to bring about internal change, why does he want to impose them?

Mr Kinnock: Not for the first time the Prime Minister dodges any question that is really related to apartheid. Last week she said that she had done quite well by persuasion, particularly in the last 18 months. In that 18 months the horrific truth is that 2,000 people have been killed in South Africa, the South African regime has undertaken armed aggression against three Commonwealth countries, thousands of people have been put in detention without trial, there have been two states of emergency and two acts of unprecedented oppression. Is that what the right hon. Lady means by doing quite well in the last 18 months?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is well aware of that. If sanctions will not work to bring about internal change, why in the world does he want to bring them in? He knows full well that they would cause starvation of children and that they would cause unemployment in South Africa on a wide scale and unemployment in this country. Why does he continue to want them under those circumstances?

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister's interest in morality in South Africa is very recent indeed. What has she been doing about the fact that half the children in the homelands die as babies? What has she ever done about the fact that there is one doctor to 44,000 black Africans? What has she ever done about the basic atrocity of apartheid? We should not take lectures, and certainly the people of South Africa will not take lectures, from the right hon. Lady about morality.

The Prime Minister: Nor do I take lectures from the right hon. Gentleman, whose party voted against sanctions when it was the Government. Perhaps he will listen to what Chief Buthelezi said in a letter to The Guardian recently:

"My forefathers fought British imperialism; today I am prepared to die for democracy, and I will not rest until apartheid is dead. But I am not prepared to lead my people into a battle where they will be decimated. South Africa cannot and will not be liberated with the blood of children." [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will hon. Gentlemen please not shout at each other across the Chamber.

Mr. David Howell: Will my hon. Friend try once more to explain to Opposition Members that by far the best way to raise the dignity, political status and prosperity of black South Africans is not to isolate the South African economy, but to follow the advice of Mrs. Helen Suzman, a fighter for black rights, by expanding investment in black South Africa and bringing new enterprise, managerial expertise and know-how to the black community? Will my right hon. Friend say what talks she has had with other industrial countries and Governments to further such positive enterprise instead of trying to ruin the South African economy, black and white?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my right hon. Friend. Mrs. Suzman also wrote an article in The Times a few days ago. Speaking about sanctions, she said:

"The likely effect in South Africa would be the imposition of a siege economy and more repression."

We adopt my right hon. Friend's view. As he knows, we have been in touch with the Economic Community. The communiqué issued recently was a communiqué of the Twelve, who are taking positive measures to bring more aid to black South Africans for their greater education. As he knows, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will be going this week to Washington to discuss the matter with the Government of the United States.

Mr. Steel: Has the Prime Minister noted the speech made at lunchtime today by the Secretary General of the Commonwealth, in which he reminded us that some of the arguments used today against sanctions are the same as were used by the West Indian planters against the abolition of slavery in the last century? Will she also note that he believes that the decision of the Commonwealth Games Federation yesterday has created what he calls a "window of opportunity" for all nations to come to the Edinburgh games? That window must not be shut in London. Will the Prime Minister support his call?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, it was this House which had a great deal to do with the abolition of slavery. It had nothing to do with sanctions. We should be proud of the record of this House, before there was a Labour party, in getting rid of slavery.

With regard to what the right hon. Gentleman said about the Commonwealth games, I greatly regret the unjustified action that has been taken about withdrawing. In regard to Zola Budd and Annette Cowley, it is not a matter for the Government but for the Commonwealth Games Federation to decide upon the eligibility of individual athletes within its own rules. It is for it to justify its decision and it is for the federation to administer its rules impartially. Those games have nothing to do with decisions of Her Majesty's Government.

Q2. Mr. Amess asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Amess: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on her recent visit to Vancouver, and on batting for British jobs and work. Will she please take every opportunity in her travels abroad and when she meets overseas visitors in London to point out to them that the new Rover car is a victory for joint design and technology?

The Prime Minister: I know that my hon. Friend never loses an opportunity to bat for interests in his constituency and that he never loses an opportunity to bat for that particular car, an opportunity that I share with him. The display in the British pavillion was absolutely first class and demonstrated all that is best in British industry and all of its successes. We are particularly good on several makes of cars and also on the railbus and the Leyland Bus. It was also very good that there was the first flypast of Concorde, which was very much welcomed by the people of Vancouver. It showed how good we are in aerospace matters.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: After arguing the case for sanctions against Libya, Afghanistan, Poland and other places, why has the Prime Minister suddenly taken such an extreme dislike to sanctions against South Africa? Surely she must realise that the British people and the British Commonwealth are crying out for moral leadership over sanctions, the type of moral leadership which, at long last, the Church of England has given?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that when it came to sanctions against Libya we argued that they do not work unless they are totally and utterly universal, and they never are. That is why they were not put on. Certainly we had good cause to turn out of London the Libyan People's Bureau, but that was not an economic sanction. Certainly we have good cause to refuse to supply defence equipment to Libya. Also, we have absolutely refused to supply defence equipment to South Africa. As for moral sense, I see nothing moral in trying to cause starvation and unemployment for people and children in South Africa.

Mr. Donald Stewart: When she quoted from last week's edition of The Guardian, why did the right hon. Lady not quote the editorial, which asked when she last took the lead in feeding the starving, when she had shown some sign of trying to find jobs for people without prospects and why, having read the Brandt report, she passed by on the other side? Is it not clear from that, that, while reading moral lectures to people who do not require them, her guiding principle is support for the South African regime?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman refers to The Guardian, may I say that I thought that there were one or two rather successful interviews in The Guardian last week, which managed to get across a number of facts that needed to be stated. There were also letters, from one of which I have quoted. As the right hon. Gentleman invited me to go on, let me quote further from the letter from which I have already quoted. Chief Buthelezi said:

"Today, more than ever, negotiation and peaceful change is within our grasp. Whites, more than ever, are ready to negotiate. Nobody can say exactly when and how, but one thing I do know: senseless violence will not help our cause."

Yes, The Guardian carries excellent letters.

Q3. Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Temple-Morris: My right hon. Friend, who is to be congratulated on her forthcoming visit to Moscow, will recollect that Mr. Gorbachev told Lord Whitelaw's recent IPU delegation that he wanted a summit, but Mr. Gorbachev understandably added that there was no point in having one unless it could agree about something. Will my right hon. Friend do her utmost to secure a summit? Will she also do her utmost to secure the prospects of an agreement on chemical weapons and, I dare say, on other matters as well?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. I think that most people hope that there will be a summit between President Reagan and Secretary General Gorbachev, and that there will be a summit this year. It will be fruitful if it succeeds in reaching some decisions on arms control, possibly as a prelude to a third summit next year. As my hon. Friend says, I believe that chemical weapons offer an area in which the Soviet Union could follow the lead given by Britain and the United States, in that she could substantially reduce her stockpile and agree not to engage in any more manufacturing of these weapons. Also, I believe that there is some hope of making further progress on intermediate nuclear weapons. There are very interesting proposals on the table now between the United States and the Soviet Union. I believe that they will be prosecuted with the utmost urgency and I hope that they will lead to a successful summit.

Q4. Mr. Terry Davis asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Davis: What does the Prime Minister mean by her earlier reference to a choice between a unitary and a federal state in South Africa? Does she want to see more Bantustans?

The Prime Minister: With respect, I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would know what the difference is without needing a lesson on it.

Mr. Maclean: Will my right hon. Friend check with her right hon. and hon. Friends to find out how many letters they have received on the issue of sanctions against South Africa? I am sure she will find that there is no great pressure from our constituents to impose sanctions against South Africa. It is a whipped-up media campaign, and our constituents do not like the hypocrisy of other African nations which have dictatorships, and which could teach South Africa a thing or two.

The Prime Minister: We certainly have not received many letters compared with the amount that we receive on some other subjects. I think that people are very much aware that the Labour party's policy would mean lost jobs and a great deal of misery among those whom we seek to help in South Africa.

Q5. Ms. Richardson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Ms. Richardson: Following the Prime Minister's visit to Canada, can she name a single Commonwealth Head who does not favour sanctions?

The Prime Minister: I think that there are other Commonwealth Heads — [HON. MEMBERS: "Who?, Where?"] — who do not favour sanctions. It is not for me to mention them here. There are many Commonwealth Heads who do not favour general economic sanctions, and most of them are talking about signals and gestures. That is totally different from the Labour party's policy, which is to create unemployment in South Africa in order to create unemployment here.

Frigates

The following Questions stood upon the Order Paper:

5. Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden) asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the export potential of type 23 frigates.

13. Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West) asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the policy of his Department relating to the intention of ordering three frigates per year; and how this is going to be fulfilled in 1986.

3.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): It remains my intention to maintain a force level of about 50 frigates and destroyers, but the number of frigates to be ordered in any one year will continue to depend on the resources available.

I am pleased to announce today that I will be placing orders for three type 23 frigates of the Duke class, two to be built at Yarrow Shipbuilders Limited on the Clyde and one at Swan Hunter Shipbuilders on Tyneside as soon as outstanding contract terms have been settled. The first two ships will start building in the coming months and the second ship at Yarrow next year.

The order with SHS followed negotiations with it, in the light of the statement made by my predecessor on 28 January 1985, which have resulted in a satisfactory agreement on price. The order with YSL followed a competition with three other yards and the winning tender offered the best value for money.

These orders will demonstrate to prospective overseas purchasers the confidence which the Royal Navy has in this highly capable warship.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his exceedingly encouraging reply, which will be warmly welcomed by the management and work force at Yarrow on Clydeside, where a number of my constituents work. Is his statement not a superb present for the yard as workers leave for their annual holidays? Is my right hon. Friend aware that Yarrow will now build a covered module yard in the facility, which will enable it to build more frigates more competitively? Will that not enhance the yard's export potential for those countries that wish to buy this type of frigate?

Mr. Younger: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for all that he has said. I fully appreciate that these valuable orders will be good news for many families at this time. Like my hon. Friend, I am glad to hear that there may be an extra covered berth, and if that results in even better value for money for future purchases from the yard, it will be very much to the advantage of the taxpayer and of the defence budget.

Mr. Douglas: The Secretary of State will not think it amiss, I hope, if we look at his answer fairly carefully in the light of what seems to be an abandonment of a commitment to order three frigates a year. Am I not correct to say that last year no frigates were ordered? This year we are ordering not three frigates but two. Can the right hon. Gentleman say when all four orders will be firm so that progress can be made with the covered berth? Will he give us some news that will make up for the leeway in frigate ordering? If we do not make up that leeway, we shall have a very old surface fleet of frigates and other surface ships.

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman is not strictly correct on the figures he has outlined. I should have thought that he would have unreservedly welcomed an order for three frigates at one time. I am sure that he will appreciate, as a person with some experience in the industry, that one has to look at this over a long period. One could say that I have now ordered three frigates this year, but, as I said, we must look at it over a longer period and the hon. Gentleman will have to wait to see what orders come in later years.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Would my right hon. Friend agree that what he has announced shows that we are not only able to maintain our own independent nuclear deterrent, but that we are able to maintain an adequate surface fleet?

Mr. Younger: My hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right. He may recall, as I do, the rather sour reaction of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) the last time there was a frigate order, when he said that it would be the last such announcement that the Government would be making in this Parliament. He said:

"From now on it is likely to be cancellations all the way."
—[Official Report, 28 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 22.]

My hon. and learned Friend is quite right.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): Were frigate type 23 03 and 04 placed on the lowest price, or were the bids of Yarrow's competitors increased by an element for lead yard services from Yarrow?

Mr. Younger: The bids for Yarrow were entirely on a competitive basis. In other words, Yarrow won the competition for those ships. The order for Swan Hunter —the frigate 02—as the hon. Gentleman knows, was a special arrangement announced by my predecessor. I have stuck to his undertakings absolutely. Lead yard services are reflected in the price we expect to get from the ships we ordered from yards other than the lead yard. It is a reflection of the value they get from the lead yard in information.

Mr. Keith Speed (Ashford): Would my right hon. Friend confirm what his predecessor told the Defence Committee, that to maintain an up-to-date and capable 50-strong force of frigates we will need to order three frigates a year for the next few years?

Mr. Younger: As my hon. Friend knows better than most of us, it is not as simple as that. The maintaining of about 50 frigates at any one time is a mixture between the new building of frigates and the length of time for which it is sensible to retain older frigates in service. However, I am sure that my hon. Friend will be encouraged to see the large series of three orders today. I hope that he will feel that that it is a good sign of the confidence we have in keeping a strong component in the Navy.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): The Secretary of State has to be congratulated, somewhat belatedly, on finally making the decision. It is of immense importance to the Tyne, especially the Wallsend constituency. I am pleased that he has mentioned a significant factor, which is to impress upon the navies of the world that Britain can build ships which would be to their advantage if purchased. That point must be emphasised repeatedly by the people who will be marketing the ships. Will the Secretary of State do his utmost to help in the marketing?

Mr. Younger: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for everything that he has said. It is a reflection of the hard work that I know he has done for a long time to help to get these orders. I agree entirely about export orders. It should now be possible for us present a strong bid throughout the world for this excellent frigate. Certainly, my Department will do all it can to help.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Does the announcement of my right hon. Friend not underline the vital contribution that Scotland makes to the defence of the West and the extent to which defence considerations make an important contribution to the jobs and economy of Scotland?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Scotland, especially in relation to the Navy, makes an outstanding contribution to the defence of the country and a large number of jobs in Scotland result from it. My hon. Friend is right to draw that to the attention of the House.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I recognise the satisfaction that the announcement will give to Yarrow in particular. However, can the Secretary of State say what action he proposes to take following the resignation of Professor Main from the proposed committee of inquiry into hull design. Are the Government going to take the considerations of the committee into account when considering future policy towards frigates?

Mr. Younger: I am sorry to point out to the hon. Gentleman that he has got the wrong person. I believe that Sir Peter Main is in charge of the teachers' inquiry. I regret that Professor Caldwell found it necessary to resign from the investigation into hull shapes for ships. He did it on his own authority, feeling that his credibility had been undermined. We will now be looking for a suitable and, I hope, independent replacement.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his announcement, but would he recognise that the outstanding export record of Vosper Thornycroft, on the south coast, makes it a prime contender for the next order that he offers?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point. Vosper Thornycroft has a fine record and, as my hon. Friend is aware, it is our lead yard for mine counter-measures vessels. As for other export orders with which Vosper Thornycroft is concerned, we shall do everything possible to assist the company.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Is the Secretary of State aware that a proper age structure for the 50-surface-ship fleet to which he referred can only be assured if an ordering pattern of three ships a year—referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas)—is resumed? Can he say whether the newly ordered type 23s will be fitted with the latest towed array sonar, which is to be denied to the type 22s?

Mr. Younger: I can confirm the hon. Gentleman's last point. I am glad to say that the three ships that we are ordering today will be fitted with new towed array sonar. There has been a gap in the ordering which is quite usual when the first of a new line of frigates is ordered. The type 23 01 has taken longer than usual to produce because it is the first. This year, we have produced an order for three follow-on frigates. The hon. Gentleman must await future announcements for other frigates in due course.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): My right hon. Friend's announcement will be welcomed by everyone who believes in the defence of Britain. The types 23 and 22 are both expensive and too sophisticated for a number of foreign purchasers. How will my right hon. Friend encourage foreign navies to buy British? What plans has he to ensure that yards develop a system for building frigates for naval use which have lower manning levels and cost less?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. The type 23 is much more economical in terms of manpower than its predecessor. It needs a considerably smaller crew and will be fitted with a great deal more sophisticated equipment. It is true that such a sophisticated vessel is of interest only to certain navies which have similar needs, but nevertheless it is more cost-effective than its predecessor. Therefore, it ought to be a better bet for many more navies than the previous type of frigate. We should do all we can to encourage its purchase.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): Although the whole of Tyneside will be pleased that the Government have confirmed this order, does the Minister appreciate that there is still a considerable shortfall of work in the area? What plans has the right hon. Gentleman to ensure that there is an on-going naval shipbuilding presence on Tyneside?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point. That there should be a shipbuilding presence on the Tyne is a matter of great concern to many of us. This order was an undertaking given to Swan Hunter and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will feel that it has been properly and completely carried out. It is worth reminding the House that we are in the middle of a large warship building programme. In real terms, it is probably the largest that we have had for many years. It is a demonstration of the importance that the Government attach to defence.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that his statement will cause great disappointment in Vosper Thornycroft in my constituency? Will he at least confirm the proposed single-role minehunter orders which will make a considerable difference to employment prospects at Vosper Thornycroft, given its disappointment at not getting one of these type 23 frigate orders?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate what my hon. Friend says about Vosper Thornycroft and I am sorry on its account that it did not win the competition for the type 23 frigate. I can confirm that we regard it as a most important yard, especially with regard to the mine counter-measures vessels and the minehunter vessels. I confirm that it is our lead yard for those vessels.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Is the Secretary of State aware that this will be good news for the workers in Yarrow before they go on their annual holidays, but will he be a bit more precise about the starting date for the building of the frigates? He did say that, in the case of the two placed at Yarrow, construction would begin in the coming months.

[Mr. Harry Ewing]

Is the Secretary of State further aware that it is entirely appropriate that he should answer the question put down by the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst), who, when he worked for the Marathon yard, had his job saved by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) when he placed an order for an oil rig? Does he think that at long last this will persuade his hon. Friends that public expenditure can not only save but create jobs?

Mr. Younger: The principal consideration that I have to have in mind when I place orders is whether they are the best value for the defence budget and the best equipment for the Royal Navy, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand that. It will be good news for those who are likely to have their jobs safeguarded.

Let me reaffirm the position on construction times. The precise starting dates for construction are for negotiation between the Department and the contractors concerned, but I understand that the one at Swan Hunter and the first of the two at Yarrow are likely to start in a few months time, and the second one at Yarrow is likely to start next year but it is not yet clear in precisely which month.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hirst: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I know about it. I will take it at the end of the statement.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): I congratulate my right hon. Friend most warmly on his decision to order three type 23 frigates. What estimate can he give the House of the number of jobs that will be safeguarded or created in the key areas of unemployment on Tyneside and Clydebank?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend hits an important note. Approximately 1,200 men per year per ship will be employed in direct labour at the yard with about twice as many again employed on sub-contracts and in the weapons and marine equipment industries. Therefore, about 10,000 jobs overall will be sustained in these important areas over several years and I am sure that my hon. Friend will want to welcome that, as indeed will the whole House.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): I congratulate the Secretary of State on at least keeping faith with Swan Hunter with regard to the frigate order. He refers to the jobs that are being saved, but is he aware that, had it not been for the robbery with violence of the auxiliary oiler replenishment vessel from Swan Hunter a lot of men who are now walking the stones would still be in full-time employment? When can we expect an encouraging statement from him on the second AOR for Swan Hunter?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate part of what the hon. Gentleman said, but his remarks about the AORs may be looked at a little askance elsewhere. If I had decided that the firm which clearly won the competition on design and price was not to get the first AOR, I would have been justifiably and severely criticised. In case the hon. Gentleman has forgotten, I remind him that in the course of that announcement I made it clear that I would make sure that Swan Hunter had a particular opportunity to bid for the second AOR order on certain terms. I should have thought that that was a fairly good gesture towards Swan Hunter which I hope is appreciated in the north-east.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The Secretary of State's long-awaited announcement is welcome on these Benches, as I am sure it is very much welcomed by the work force at Yarrow and Swan Hunter. As he has rightly and properly taken into account the undertaking given by his predecessor to the Swan Hunter yard and no doubt awarded the order on a basis other than sheer competitive price, will what might be called the difference in price fall on an overstretched defence budget or can it be allocated to some other budget such as, for example, that of the Department of Employment?

The right hon. Gentleman has mentioned that this must be looked at on a long-term basis. Can he assure the House that, over that long term, bearing in mind the pattern of new ships coming into service and older vessels going out of service, there always will be a surface fleet of about 50 vessels, or will there be a shortfall at some stage during that period?

Mr. Younger: I see the point that the hon. Gentleman is getting at about the small amount of extra cost which we shall have paid by placing the order somewhat uncompetitively at Swan Hunter. That is something that we had already undertaken to do, and, therefore, it falls on the defence budget. I make no complaint about that because it was a decision taken openly by the Department some time ago.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the ordering position generally. He is right in his suspicion that the way in which the orders are placed must be balanced out between how long the existing ships can be kept going economically and sensibly and how much new build is needed to keep the fleet in balance. I have maintained the policy, which has been the policy of the Department for a long time, that about 50 frigates will be kept in commission. I think that the House would like to know that.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that his statement will come as a great relief both to the Royal Navy and the warship building yards involved. He will also recognise that it does not solve the fundamental problems of arriving at a modern 50-warship Navy by the 1990s. The right hon. Gentleman said that there would be two orders this year and one next year. What will the cost be in terms of the Ministry of Defence budget in this financial year? In other words, how much money will come out of the Ministry of Defence budget in this financial year as a result of today's announcement?

Mr. Younger: The right hon. Gentleman was somewhat less than generous in his opening remarks. I should have thought that it was a major step towards having a modern force of about 50 frigates in the 1990s. I leave that aside. The position of the frigates in the programme must be balanced out with all the other factors. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take that as a clear indication. Costs are commercial and confidential. However, I have aready made it clear that the cost of the frigates is about £115 million each. While I cannot give the precise prices for the group of three frigates, I can say that we have made a saving of about 5 per cent. on what we expected to spend.

Mr. Davies rose——

Mr. Speaker: No. The right hon. Member cannot ask a second question. I am sorry.

Mr. Hirst: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For the avoidance of doubt and in view of the incorrect statements made by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), I make it absolutely clear that I have never worked in a shipyard. I am a chartered accountant by profession. I have spent all my working life in private practice. My interest in tabling a question today and on previous occasions about defence matters and shipbuilding relates to the fact that I have constantly championed the excellence of shipbuilding on Clydeside and at Yarrow.

Mr. Ewing: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. For the avoidance of doubt, I have never said that the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) worked in a shipyard. I was talking about the oil rig construction yard that the hon. Gentleman worked for on Clydeside.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise directly from this matter?

Mr. Spicer: It arises directly from Prime Minister's Question Time.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take it after the private notice question.

Commonwealth Games

3.52 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the latest position regarding the forthcoming Commonwealth games.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): The present position is that over 2,800 athletes and officials from 54 Commonwealth countries have informed the organisers that they will be attending the games. I hope that that number may be increased to the original figure of over 3,100 athletes and officials if the five boycotting countries reconsider their position.

I remain confident that the organisers will stage the 13th Commonwealth games successfully. Scotland will give its traditional warm welcome to the many Commonwealth athletes and their supporters who wish to come to Edinburgh this summer.

Mr. Dewar: Will the Secretary of State note that we share the general regret about the troubles that have beset the games with the withdrawal of the five African nations and, I fear, indications of further problems to come? I endorse his hope that the games will be a success and that it will be possible to undo some of the damage that has been done.

Will the Secretary of State dissociate himself from the call made today by a Conservative Member of Parliament to cancel the games? Does he agree that it is a tragedy that the friendly games have been fractured in this way and become a victim of our isolation in the Commonwealth because of the Prime Minister's intransigence? Will he make it clear to the Commonwealth that the games are being hosted by the Scottish people, not by Downing street? Will he reflect directly to the Commonwealth the strong feelings throughout Scotland on the issue, our abhorrence of apartheid and our deep differences with the Prime Minister on the sanctions issue? Is it not right to urge on Commonwealth countries, which are concerned and understandably bitter about Britain's attitude to sanctions, that the best way forward is to argue the case in the Commonwealth and not to boycott the games?

As the Secretary of State knows, great efforts are being made to put the games on a sound financial footing. Clearly, that has not been helped by the current turmoil. We are all aware that there has been no financial backing from the Government. That has been conspicuously absent. Will the Secretary of State be prepared to look sympathetically at any future approach for material support to meet liabilities which could not have been anticipated and result from factors beyond the organisers' control?

Mr. Rifkind: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's comment that the Opposition share the view of the Government and, I am sure, all British people that all Commonwealth countries should come to the games in Edinburgh, and that it would be wrong for differences of opinion on other matters to endanger or threaten the value of the Commonwealth Games.

Despite the regrettable signs from five countries that they are not at present intending to come to the games, the remaining countries which are participating will nevertheless send more athletes to these Commonwealth Games in Edinburgh than have attended any previous Commonwealth Games in the history of the event. Therefore, the games, which will begin next week, still look like being the best and largest-ever games that the Commonwealth has experienced.

[Mr. Rifkind]

Whatever one's views may be about the issue of sanctions against South Africa, the whole value of the Commonwealth Games in the past has been its expression of the multiracial identity of the Commonwealth. There is no better way of showing South Africa our abhorrence of apartheid than by having a successful multiracial Commonwealth Games, symbolising the unity which the Commonwealth should represent.

On the financial aspects, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Commonwealth Games organisers have raised substantial sums, and that following changes announced two weeks ago new initiatives, including some exciting ones, have been launched to fill the remaining gap. I remain confident that that will be possible.

Finally, I remind the House and those who have criticised the Commonwealth Games that the games belong not to any one country or Government, but to the Commonwealth as a whole. It is both illogical and undesirable that the Commonwealth Games, which belong to the Commonwealth, should be boycotted by individual countries because of their disagreement with one Commonwealth Government.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): Will my right hon. and learned Friend take this opportunity to condemn in forthright terms the exclusion on purely racial grounds of Miss Budd and Miss Cowley from the games? Will he take on board that eligibility is the criterion? I understand from what I saw on television last night that the team which is representing Monserrat includes one competitor who was born in Monserrat but never lived there and one who has never lived there. Will my right hon. and learned Friend take this opportunity to express the British public's horror at the politicisation of the games?

Mr. Rifkind: One certainly regrets the politicisation of any games. The entitlement of any individual athlete to participate in the Commonwealth Games is entirely a matter for the Commonwealth Games Federation. I cannot properly comment on whether the exercise of discretion by the federation was correct or incorrect. That is a matter for which it must take responsibility.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Further to the point made by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), surely the Secretary of State recognises that the countries which have withdrawn from the games are feeling extremely bitter about the situation? Does he agree that it is within the power of the Prime Minister to give signals that she is willing to consider agreement on sanctions in August, and that that would lift the cloud from the games? The Secretary of State said that he was confident that financial matters would be all right. Has he made no contingency arrangements in case there is a shortfall?

Mr. Rifkind: On the hon. Gentleman's latter point, I can state that those who have become involved in the financial aspects of the Commonwealth games have launched certain new initiatives. There is every prospect that the initiatives will raise the funds which are needed.

In relation to the hon. Gentleman's earlier point, certain African countries have expressed their concern about the South African issue by refusing to participate in the games. Other African countries have taken a different view. The Malawi team has already arrived in Scotland and the Gambia has said that it will take part. It is likely that other African countries will take part. There is clearly a difference of opinion within Africa, but it is true that those who wish to support the Commonwealth ideal, which is a multiracial ideal, can express that best by participating in the games.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the games will be a resounding success if only 2,000 competitors participate in the right spirit and wish to enjoy themselves? Does he further agree that the federation should not give up its principles for expediency and devalue the games by banning competitors with British passports?

Mr. Rifkind: The federation must be responsible for its own decisions with regard to specific applications from athletes in national teams. I endorse my hon. Friend's view that the games look like being the largest and one of the most successful events ever enjoyed in the history of the Commonwealth. I believe that the vast majority of Commonwealth countries intend to participate, and Scotland will do its best to give them a warm welcome.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Is the Secretary of State aware that the games will be seriously damaged by the withdrawal of the five nations and the prospective withdrawal of others? Does he agree that it is futile to deny that, just as it is futile for him to deny that this is only the first damage that will be done to the Commonwealth by the Prime Minister's obsessively antagonistic attitude to effective economic sanctions against South Africa?

Mr. Rifkind: I must stress to the right hon. Gentleman that every country in the Commonwealth is a sovereign and independent state, and that includes the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom should be given the right to determine its policy, just as every other member state should have that right.

I must concede that the withdrawal of any Commonwealth country from the games will diminish them. It goes without saying that the attitude of a large proportion of the Commonwealth will be influenced by the fact that all parties in this House, including the Opposition, are appealing to all Commonwealth countries to come to the games and to make them a great success, irrespective of any difference of view about sanctions. The British Parliament and people support that view, and that will carry great weight with many Commonwealth countries.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Is it not intolerable that we should take lessons on human rights from the likes of Ghana and Uganda? Why is it always Britain and the British teams that are kicked around? Why do not my right hon. and hon. Friends, instead of washing their hands of this affair, campaign for the five countries that are boycotting the games to comply fully with the declaration of Commonwealth principles on individual freedom and political rights?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct. Double standards are occasionally applied by countries with regard to human rights. It is appropriate for those campaigning properly for human rights in South Africa to be sure that they fully observe the same principles in their own country.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Does the Secretary of State realise that there is a danger of further withdrawals of Commonwealth countries from the games because of the Prime Minister's attitude? As Scotland's representative — or so he claims — will he write to all Commonwealth countries to explain that the Scottish people were not responsible for the election of the Government or the Prime Minister and to dissociate the Scottish people from the pro-apartheid views held by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Rifkind: The vast majority of the Scottish people do not believe that the Commonwealth games should be used as a method of blackmail on issues of national policy. I hope that the hon. Gentleman shares that view. I remind the hon. Gentleman that while we are delighted that the Commonwealth games are to be held in Edinburgh, the games do not belong to Scotland or to the United Kingdom; they are the games of the Commonwealth, they are being hosted in Scotland, and that is a matter of great pleasure to us.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the vast majority of people in Scotland are sick to death of politics intervening in sport? Does he agree that the five African countries which have sought the high moral political ground have a disgraceful record on human rights? All those countries practice political repression and detention without trial. Is it not time that we began to highlight that rather than allow those countries to steal the limelight?

Mr. Rifkind: It is not simply the Scottish people who regret the politicisation of these games by certain countries. The athletes of the countries concerned must also bitterly regret the decisions announced by their respective Governments. Even at this late stage, I hope that the five countries involved will reconsider their decisions and realise that the Commonwealth games will help to further the multiracial ideal and that any damage to the Commonwealth Games will badly affect that ideal.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Does the Secretary of State recall that when Mr. Gandhi succeeded his mother as Prime Minister, our Prime Minister and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State, then at the Foreign Office, paid glowing tributes to him? Does the Secretary of State think that Mr. Gandhi has changed since then? Are not the words of such a distinguished international statesman important? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman simply casting them aside?

Mr. Rifkind: I entirely endorse the view that the Indian Prime Minister is a distinguished statesman. That does not require me to say that we must necessarily agree with all the opinions that he holds. The same could be said of other statesmen in various countries.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many people welcome that part of the statement and the earlier comments of the Prime Minister that emphasise that the Commonwealth Games Federation is independent of the Government in this country? That would be welcomed in other countries that are not democracies in the free sense that we understand the word. Will he confirm to the world and to those coming to Edinburgh from the Commonwealth that regardless of colour, creed, race, nationality or the politics of their Government, they will be welcome to tour around Scotland after they have enjoyed the games?

Mr. Rifkind: That is very much the case. I endorse my hon. Friend's comment that it would be highly desirable if the Commonwealth Games Federation could be as independent in the exercise of its discretion in every other Commonwealth country as it is in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), the Secretary of State said that he was confident about where finance for the games would come from. He changed that a little in answer to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) when he said that he was confident that there was every prospect of funds being found. As I have attended many meetings of the main organising committee, which is extremely worried about finance, may I ask the Secretary of State where the shortfall is to come from? What basis does the Secretary of State have for confidence that the money will be forthcoming? It is jolly difficult at present to raise money.

Mr. Rifkind: There may be certain difficulties, but a high proportion of the necessary funding has already been raised. Those responsible for raising finance have expressed confidence in their ability to raise the remaining sums. In the past few days they have launched a number of important new initiatives, and I have no reason at present to believe that they will be other than successful.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that if the internal political and domestic arrangements of countries are to become the criteria for participation by sportsmen in international sporting events, we would do well to direct people's attention to military regimes and one-party undemocratic states which are prepared to send athletes to international sporting events and to criticise the internal political arrangements of other states? Does he agree that it is high time that there was consistency in these matters before they are taken further?

Mr. Rifkind: I share my hon. Friend's aspiration for consistency. I am not as confident as he is in our ability to achieve that.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Does the Secretary of State accept that even those Commonwealth countries which intend to participate in the games disagree violently with the Prime Minister's views on sanctions and South Africa? Is it therefore not clear that the damage that will be done to the Commonwealth will be achieved not by a gesture vis-a-vis the games but in other ways? Does he disagree in principle with Government financial assistance for the games?

Mr. Rifkind: On the hon. Gentleman's latter point, I have made it clear that the Government have all along said that the decision to hold the games in Scotland was taken on the basis that there would be no request for Government funding. That position has been repeated on many occasions. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's observation that it is possible to have different views on sanctions against South Africa and still feel it proper to participate in the games. That view is clearly shared on both sides of the House. We must hope that the five countries that have said they will not attend the games will reconsider their decisions in the light of the unanimous view of all the political parties represented in the United Kingdom.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to bear in mind that this is a private notice question and, furthermore, a ten-minute Bill and a Standing Order No. 10 application are to come. I shall allow questions to go on for a further six minutes. We must move on after that.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend realise that the people of Scotland were delighted that all the members of the Commonwealth were to come to Edinburgh to participate in the games, but they find it offensive that countries that have had a recent history of genocide and have also practised repression of a sort that is totally alien to Scotland's history and culture now say that their members cannot come and participate in our free country? We object to that. We cannot stop our sportsmen going anywhere. Those countries apparently can.

Mr. Rifkind: I accept my hon. Friend's view that the double standards that are sometimes applied are not only regrettable, but it is difficult to believe that they are consistent with a real desire to enhance human rights in other countries.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): In making the valid and proper point that the multiracial nature of the games can send a most effective signal to countries such as South Africa, as the Secretary of State has done, does he agree that such a signal would have been good to see from the Prime Minister, and that the perceived ignorance and insensitivity of her signals have got us into the pathetic shambles that we are now in over the games?

Mr. Rifkind: In his latter comments, the hon. Gentleman was being grossly unfair. While he is entitled to disagree with the Prime Minister's view, he should at least acknowledge that the Prime Minister and the Government as a whole genuinely and deeply believe that the imposition of general economic sanctions could do enormous damage to the livelihood and, indeed, in some cases, the lives of very many poor people in South Africa. As that view is shared by many black and white South Africans, who are totally opposed to apartheid, the hon. Gentleman should not question the integrity of those whose views on the subject are different from his own.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Is it not an affront that countries whose democratic experience is limited to one man, one vote, once, should seek to lecture this country on its policies on South Africa, particularly when their own record on racial discrimination is so appalling? The fact of the matter is that this Government will subject themselves to the electorate in 1987 or 1988 in a democratic election, but none of the countries in southern Africa that are boycotting the games will do that. They will all be re-elected, whatever happens.

Mr. Rifkind: It is important to remember that the ethos of the Commonwealth is not that we all necessarily share the same political system but that we have to share certain basic historical experiences and values. The Commonwealth games present an extraordinarily good opportunity to translate that shared experience into a common relevant contribution to the problems in the world at present.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Does not the Government's morality simply mean that it is all right to murder innocent men, women and children as well as to take action against Afghanistan and the Soviet Union just before the Moscow Olympic Games? Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman has forgotten, but those things happened. However, if the Government are not prepared to take sanctions because they want to protect profits and investments, will they do the decent thing for us in Edinburgh by making sure that no Ministers turn up, including the Prime Minister, because that would be the ultimate insult?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman has made his usual constructive contribution to the discussion.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Is not my right hon. and learned Friend encouraged by the questions from Conservative Members, who have shown the humbug that has been exposed in this matter? Is he aware that the British public are thoroughly fed up with the attitude of many Commonwealth countries, which cannot presume to lecture us, an old democracy, and the home of freedom? Furthermore, are not he and the whole of Her Majesty's Government disgusted at the BBC's bias —its anti-British and anti-Government bias—in all its comments on the games, which are supposed to be non-party and for the good of the whole of humanity?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend's question covers several points, but it is fair to point out that, as we understand the position, the vast majority of Commonwealth countries, including those from Asia, many from Africa, and those from the West Indies and the Pacific as well as the old Commonwealth, are intending to come to the Commonwealth Games in Edinburgh. The vast majority of the original number of athletes who applied are still on their way. Therefore, the Commonwealth Games appear to have the prospect of being a successful occasion, with the number of countries that are not participating remaining a very small proportion of the total.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Is it not an insult to the black nations that have withdrawn for the Secretary of State to say, as he did, that, even after their withdrawal, these will be the best games yet? Surely he must recognise that the withdrawal of just the five countries and those black athletes is a tragic blow to the games? Is he aware that the vast majority of the people of Scotland and Edinburgh hold the Prime Minister responsible for those withdrawals, and that if she persists in her present policy towards South Africa, she will break up the Commonwealth itself?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman must appreciate that at the moment we understand that 2,800 athletes, from every corner of the world, including Africa, are still intending to come to the Commonwealth games in Edinburgh. That means that the games will be the largest Commonwealth games ever held. On that basis I believe that I am entitled to say that they seem to have every prospect of also being one of the most successful games ever held.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): The Secretary of State has emphasised throughout that these are not British but Commonwealth games. May we now ask him and the Prime Minister to listen to the Commonwealth, which virtually universally has condemned the isolated position that she has taken up? Has not the right hon. Lady now reached the stage where she appears to be prepared not only to sacrifice the games but almost to sacrifice the Commonwealth for her own position?

Mr. Rifkind: I said earlier, and I think that the hon. Gentleman will accept, that the Commonwealth has never survived or prospered on enforced unanimity and uniformity of view on issues in which individual sovereign Governments have to take into account their genuine views as to what the proper development of policy requires. Of course, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Heads of Government of other Commonwealth countries will discuss those matters. There is to be a meeting at the beginning of August to review the situation, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will make a full contribution to that discussion.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): Does not the right hon. and learned Gentleman realise that if he, as Secretary of State, is to make any contribution at all towards making the Commonwealth games a success—we all want them to be a success—he should at least distance himself from the more strident remarks of the Prime Minister in relation to sanctions on South Africa?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman should realise that my interest as Secretary of State for Scotland is to see a successful Commonwealth games in Edinburgh. I believe that they are likely to be the largest ever held. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and, indeed, all my right hon. and hon. Friends, share that aspiration. The best contribution that Opposition Members can make is to emphasise the bipartisan view held by both sides of the House. Those who wish to see the Commonwealth prosper should be encouraging every country to send teams to the games.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Is the Secretary of State aware that there is an undercurrent on the Right wing of his party, hoping for the collapse of the games and, indeed, like the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner), wanting the break-up of the Commonwealth itself? Will the Secretary of State, on behalf of the Government, dissociate the Government from those views?

Mr. Rifkind: I know of no such view being held as the hon. Gentleman implies, but, if he genuinely believes that such a view is held, I trust that he will encourage those countries that are presently contemplating a boycott to reconsider their position.

Kent County Constabulary

4.18 pm

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"evidence of serious malpractice by officers of the Kent county constabulary and the inquiry by officers of the Metropolitan police and the Police Complaints Authority thereinto."

Several reports since Sunday in the press and by television and radio have given prominence to allegations by my constituent, Mr. Ron Walker, who is a serving officer in the Kent constabulary. Mr. Walker has alleged that fellow officers have been involved in widespread and systematic malpractice which has led to the clear-up rate of offences in Kent seeming to be better than it really is. Mr. Walker claims that convicted criminals have been persuaded to admit, without fear of further prosecution, offences that they did not commit and that false confessions have been written by police officers, thus allowing offences to be "written off" as cleared up. He further alleges that fictitious offences have been recorded, only to be falsely confessed and written off.

These are serious allegations and Mr. Walker, who has placed his career on the line, has provided sufficient evidence in two specimen incidents to prompt the deputy chief constable of Kent, whose responsibility disciplinary matters are, to commission an inquiry by another force—the Metropolitan police—and to inform, properly, the Police Complaints Authority. That inquiry has now taken place and I understand that a lengthy report is in the hands of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

I am concerned about the nature of the inquiry, especially its terms of reference. It is reported—I know not how reliably—that the inquiry was restricted to an investigation of Mr. Walker's two specific specimen allegations and that no wider investigation took place. In view of Mr. Walker's more wide-ranging contentions, care should have been taken to determine whether they were two isolated incidents or whether, as Mr. Walker suggested, they were but examples of much wider abuse of the write-off system.

The last thing I want is for this unhappy matter to become a stick with which to beat the police by those who would gainsay the normally high standards of the police. I believe, however, that in the public interest we should know urgently from my right hon. Friend the Secretary whether the inquiry was restricted or whether it was drawn widely enough to determine whether there was widespread malpractice and abuse of the write-off system.

I believe that this urgent and important matter should be settled before we rise for the recess so that public confidence in the police, which must inevitably have been damaged by Mr. Walker's allegations, is restored as soon as possible. That is why I have sought leave to move the Adjournment of the House to discuss this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

[Mr. Speaker]

"evidence of serious malpractice by officers of the Kent county constabulary and the inquiry by officers of the Metropolitan police and the Police Complaints Authority thereinto."

I have listened carefully to the hon. Member but I must rule that the matter which he has raised is not appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House. I hope that he will find other ways to raise the matter.

Housing Condition Survey (Scotland)

4.22 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to impose a duty on the Secretary of State for Scotland to undertake a survey of the conditions of the public and private sector housing stock in Scotland every five years; to provide for the publication of the survey; and for connected purposes.

The first house condition survey took place exclusively in England in 1967. There had been increasing disquiet about the rate of slum clearance in the early 1960s, and in 1964 the Government required local authorities to submit returns of all their remaining unfit houses. A sub-committee of the Central Housing Advisory Committee was set up to deal with the difficulties of obtaining better data on the standards of unfitness. It became known as the Denington committee. It took an active interest in the need to collect accurate information on the condition of the older housing stock and specifically recommended a national house condition survey.

Since then, England and Wales have had the benefit of surveys carried out on a national basis at five-yearly intervals. The first house condition survey played a large part in the switch from demoliton to rehabilitation in housing policy in the late 1960s. In Northern Ireland, house condition surveys began in 1974 and have been maintained on a five-yearly cycle, in 1979 and in 1984.

The English survey is paid for out of the housing research budget. The total annual budget for the 1986 survey is estimated to be about £1·4 million. The cost of the Welsh survey, which, too, is financed from a specific research account, is likely to be £1·5 million. The Northern Ireland budget is included in the block allocation for supervision and management and therefore is not available to be identified as a separate cost.

Of course, it can be argued that, if the research budget is expanded to meet the cost of a survey, less money is available for capital expenditure. I submit that, measured against the estimated cost of the perceived investment need, which the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities estimates to be about £819 million, the £1 million a year, or sums of that order, which would be required to finance such a survey are well worth paying in terms of the benefits that would directly accrue on a continuing basis for all such surveys.

Recent developments have further reinforced the case for house condition surveys to be extended to cover and embrace Scotland. They include the Duke of Edinburgh's recent inquiry into the state of British housing, which was published in July 1985, and the inquiry by the Department of the Environment into the condition of local authority housing stock in England, which was published in November 1985. The latter revealed that the condition of housing stock was much worse than had originally been suspected.

During the passage of the current Housing (Scotland) Bill, the Government were repeatedly pressed—I give credit to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), who was in the van of that movement—to make a commitment to set up a nationally based survey. In addition, the third report of the Select Committee on the Environment made specific reference in paragraph 22 to the importance of the English house condition survey and went as far as to say that the next survey should be brought forward.

The Government's response to all this has been, to put it mildly, minimal. Last week, in the housing debate on Estimates day in the Scottish Grand Committee, the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland — the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram)—said that he was keen to set up a project to make technical advice available to local authorities which could then undertake local surveys. Such proposals do not even begin to measure up to the need in Scotland to assess the extent of the investment required and to bring public and private housing stock to tolerable standards. I suspect that the extent of the need is as suggested by COSLA. It will be impossible to finalise arguments on that score until we undertake an objective survey. Until that is done, there will always be room for continuing political argument.

I fully accept that it would be impossible for any Government to respond immediately in meeting the total bill. It would be unrealistic to expect that to happen. However, it is evident to everyone in Scotland, except the Government, that existing sources of information on house conditions are inadequate. At present, there is no basis for knowing whether house conditions in Scotland are worse or better than in other parts of the United Kingdom. It is not known whether Scotland is receiving an appropriate share of national resources. A regular house condition survey would make it possible to review the success of legislation, expenditure, priorities and programmes and would identify problems and new policy directions.

Postponed maintenance is inevitably more costly than maintenance, if not eventual enforced demolition and rebuild. A survey's objectives would include the ability to identify and cost the need for improvement and repair. A survey could make comparisons between tenures and districts, help determine local priorities and provide guidance for legislation. It could embrace also a social survey of family groups and types. A sample of 56,000 houses, which is the suggested number, could be covered over a five-year period at an annual cost of £1 million, which represents only 0·22 per cent. of the 1986 capital allocation. A house condition survey in Scotland is therefore a stitch in time that would save nine. It is urgently required. It should be funded and organised by central Government, and the Bill sets out to achieve just that.

4.30 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the hon. Member seek to oppose the Bill?

Mr. Walker: Yes, Sir; I oppose the Bill. The issues that it raises have been discussed at great length in Committee, as the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) is aware. Indeed, we have discussed the issues more than once in Committee. We are in a period of scarce resources and cash is required for the improvement of houses rather than for surveys to tell us what we already know is wrong. Local authorities know exactly what they are required to do with their houses. What is required is the necessary resources to put right the wrongs.

The Select Committee on Scottish Affairs has prepared a report, having considered the problems of condensation and dampness. Information was made available and it was clear that local authorities were not too happy that we had discovered that some of them were falling down on their job. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire suggests that we should spend £5 million over five years on a survey, but that £5 million could be spent on putting wrongs right. He has suggested a complete misuse of scarce resources.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire will be aware that the English survey, which he talked about and complimented, is nothing like what he was advising would be included in the proposed survey for Scotland. If he reads carefully the report of his speech, he will realise that he was proposing something different from the sample which was taken in England. He knows that it was based on a sample because that was made clear in Committee.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire is indulging in a Liberal party gimmick that is designed to get publicity for something that it wants when the real answer is to deal with the problem directly and solve it. That is why I oppose the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Archy Kirkwood, Sir Russell Johnston, Mr. Charles Kennedy, Mr. Gordon Wilson, Mr. George Foulkes, Mr. James Wallace and Mr. Malcolm Bruce.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood accordingly presented a Bill to impose a duty on the Secretary of State for Scotland to undertake a survey of the conditions of the public and private sector housing stock in Scotland every five years; to provide for the publication of the survey; and for connected purposes: and the same was read the First time; And ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 24 October and to be printed. [Bill 208.]

Opposition Day

[18TH ALLOTTED DAY] [1ST PART]

High Technology Industries

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I inform the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.33 pm

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I beg to move,

That this House, recognising the importance to employment, defence, education and the economy of a strong high technology sector, expresses its concern that a regettable consequence of the United States Government's attempts to impose its laws on United Kingdom companies is to damage relationships between the two countries; regrets Her Majesty's Government's failure to take effective action to stop the extra-territorial imposition of United States law on United Kingdom firms exporting high technology from the United Kingdom; notes that a number of British computer manufacturers have been forced out of business by use of the United States blacklist; urges the Government to refuse to allow United States Government officials to inspect United Kingdom companies for compliance with United States laws; and calls on the Government to defend and assist British high technology industries, to preserve United Kingdom sovereignty, to support the rule of international law and to use the opportunity of the Presidency of the European Community Commission to co-ordinate policies to promote European high technology co-operation.

This debate is, in part, about the state of Britain's high-tech industry. Goodness knows, the industry needs some attention. Last year we had a deficit in high-tech trade of £1·3 billion, and the deficit is predicted to rise by 1990 to about £5 billion annually. The industry is suffering severe problems in software, as the recent ACARD report revealed. The earlier NEDO report told us that there are problems in the industry generally. Meanwhile, at a time of high unemployment, the skill gap in trained high technologists is growing wider and wider, with the number of computer graduates leaving university falling further and further behind the industry's needs. I have no doubt that all these matters will be referred to by others during the debate.

I wish to raise a matter that is at once more specific and wider in its overall implication. The United States Government are being permitted by the British Government to impose and even administer their own laws on British high-tech firms operating within Britain. This is damaging appropriate relations between allies and placing burdens on British high-technology trade. It is yet another example of the way in which the Government seem prepared to allow the United States Government increasingly to dictate what happens within the United Kingdom.

Of the top 10 computer companies in Britain, nine are United States subsidiaries. Even ICL, our only home-grown United Kingdom company that is in the list, is 25 per cent. United States owned. Perhaps more important is the fact that 80 per cent. of all components used in United Kingdom high-tech manufacture come from the United States. There is nothing wrong in that because high-tech trade is truly international, and I would not wish to see it otherwise. What is wrong, however, is the way in which the British Government permit the United States to use their powerful position in the United Kingdom market place to impose United States regulations in Britain and to diminish the viability and capacity of United Kingdom companies to trade abroad. This is exactly what is happening and what has happened continuously over the past four years.

This issue surfaced with the now famous IBM letter of 23 December 1983. The letter, which was sent to all IBM's United Kingdom customers, informed British firms that certain computers that they had purchased from IBM could not be moved within the United Kingdom without permission from the United States Government. Despite considerable public comment about the letter, IBM has recently confirmed to me that the letter still applies and will not be withdrawn.

Digital Equipment Corporation — DEC UK Ltd — tells its United Kingdom customers in a written document that they must obey United States export control laws, even when trading within the United Kingdom, and that DEC UK will within Britain. That will be done, apparently, according to United States laws. Texas Instruments and many other major United States firms operating in Britain insist on similar provisions.

"control movement of hardware, software and knowhow"

The effects of these requirements are considerable. Many United Kingdom banks and large corporations that own certain United States produced computers will be required formally and technically to ask for a licence from the United States Government before moving the computers from one location to another, even within the United Kingdom. This requirement appears even to apply to certain computers owned by the Government themselves, as I shall shortly show. Secondly, United States subsidiaries within the United Kingdom do not generally export any of their products except to their own subsidiaries. That is a consequence of United States law. Thirdly, United Kingdom companies seeking to export their manufactured goods must now apply for United States export licences if the goods contain any United States produced component, no matter how small.

In essence, they must apply for two export licences, one from the Department of Trade and Industry to conform with COCOM regulations and one from the United States Department of Commerce. I am happy to say that they are usually able to get a licence quickly from the DTI. It is a fairly simple process and we are grateful for that. However, this is not the case when it comes to the licence that has to be obtained from the United States. The Department of Commerce frequently takes up to three months to issue a licence, and has in the past been known to refuse a licence to a United Kingdom company without offering any explanation. For example, major export orders were lost to Cable and Wireless because the Department of Commerce in Washington, without any explanation, rejected, ignored and finally returned licence applications relating to equipment for China. It is a matter of record that at the same time United States firms were selling precisely the same equipment to the Chinese Government. They were doing so without restraint.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): How wide is the hon. Gentleman's definition of high technology industries? Is his definition confined to the information technology industry, or does it embrace, for example, the offshore oil and gas industry?

Mr. Ashdown: In this instance my definition is directed chiefly to the information technology industry and the components that it uses. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be able to make his own contribution to the debate.

I am not at liberty to say which British firms have approached me expressing their concern about the situation which I have described and the impact that it is having on their trading viability. The firms concerned are naturally frightened of retaliatory action from the United States Department of Commerce if they kick up a fuss. I can say, however, that numbered among the firms are Britain's foremost computer manufacturers.

On 23 April the United States Government enacted the final formalisation of their export regulations covering high-tech exports under the United States Export Administration Act. Apart from the conditions already described, the new regulations make the Department of Commerce responsible for the policing of United States distribution licences in foreign countries, including the United Kingdom. It also makes the checking of end users abroad the responsibility of other "United States agencies". I understand this to be the normal form of words used in many instances to describe the CIA. We know from a speech in Palo Alto made by the then director of the CIA, Mr. William Casey, on 3 April 1984, that the CIA operates a blacklist of 300 European firms which have contravened United States regulations. I was subsequently informed during a telephone conversation that I had with the CIA that among these are a number of British firms.

It is under this new regulation that United States Commerce Department officials sought to visit the United Kingdom earlier this year to inspect the books of United Kingdom companies operating within Britain in order to ensure that they complied with United States law. I am astounded to know that the Government did not dismiss this application out of hand. Indeed, I believe that they are still considering it. I ask the Minister to make it clear in his speech what the Government intend to do to protect United Kingdom firms from this intrusion, and why they have taken so long to do it.

The Government have always said that they reject these United States claims. When I first raised the matter with the then Secretary of State in 1984 I was informed that they would treat each United States demand on a "case-by-case basis"—the very words, incidentally, used in the Government's amendment to our motion. But they have done nothing about the IBM letter, a copy of which they have; or about the DEC licence instructions, a copy of which they have, or about the Texas Instruments demands, a copy of which they have.

In a letter to me of 3 July 1985, the Attorney-General declared that United States claims in this matter were "an unwarranted encroachment on UK jurisdiction and contrary to international law".

Yet such claims continue, they are not dismissed — indeed, the Government say that they are still considering them. The House is entitled to know why.

The problem has worsened. In the last few months a major United States subsidiary, Motorola, has refused a British citizen a car phone because he is said to be on a United States Government denial list. This has had the effect initially of denying a British citizen access to the British Telecom network. DEC UK has also recently insisted that any British student attending a DEC course in Britain must sign a form agreeing to accept United States export administration law, even though he will not place one foot outside the United Kingdom.

I have also learnt that United Kingdom companies submitting licence applications to the United States will have full details of their firms and operations passed on to the Pentagon, which will check up on them and the equipment that they are purchasing. The effect of this, as I understand it, is that if a British-manufactured Apricot computer is bought by a firm today and subsequently sold, say, seventh hand in five years' time to a buyer in a prohibited country — which incidentally, includes Iran, Iraq and Syria — that British firm could technically be held responsible for that ultimate destination. Indeed, one United Kingdom company, Systime, has effectively been driven out of business because of United States sanctions —or at least partly because of United States sanctions— against it for exporting in this case to Switzerland. I also understand that Thorn EMI is having considerable difficulty extracting its own equipment and designs for its world-beating transputer from its United States factory.

What have the Government done about this? Perhaps most remarkable of all, in view of the Government's agreement that these United States claims are illegal and will be countered on a "case-by-case basis" — I use the words used in the amendment — is the fact that the Government themselves seem to have agreed to accept a United States claim that they must ask the United States Government's permission to move a computer that they themselves own from one location to another.

As I understand it, the United States Government have forbidden Her Majesty's Government to move their own Cray super-computer owned by the Department of Energy at Harwell to the university of London without formal United States approval. This happened in May, yet our Government are still considering the matter. Indeed, I have just heard today that the United States Government have imposed unilateral third party restraints on the Japanese companies Fujitsu, Hitachi and NEC, and their European distributors Amdahl, Basef and Siemens, to prevent them from supplying London university with an alternative super-computer. Meanwhile our own Department of Trade and Industry, I understand, is still petitioning the United States Government for permission to move its own Government computer 40 miles from Essex to London.

Is this not a disgraceful situation for a British Government to accept? I ask the Minister to indicate clearly to the House whether the United States claim on this matter will be repudiated or whether the Government intend to be party to an act which their own Attorney-General has described as "an . . . encroachment on UK jurisdiction and contrary to international law".

Our Government's apparent acceptance of the fact that the United States has a right not only to impose but also to administer its own law in Britain is a direct infringement of our sovereignty. It also comprises a major and damaging barrier to United Kingdom trade.

I do not claim that the United States Government's intention is to give their own firms a trading advantage through these actions. I am convinced that United States claims are driven by a genuine, if in my view mistaken, attempt to protect high-tech secrets. But there is no doubt that these regulations are being used by United States industry, and particularly the larger United States firms, to keep out United Kingdom and European exporters while they move in and clean up. The figures show this perfectly clearly. According to the only figure that I have managed to get out—I stand to be corrected if I am wrong, but it is difficult to pull out figures because they are not differentiated very clearly — while United Kingdom high-tech exports to the eastern bloc have fallen to approximately £40 million a year, in the same period, United States high-tech trade to the eastern bloc countries has risen from $230 million in 1980 to $1·5 billion last year, and is predicted to rise to $5 billion this year.

I do not suggest that we do not need a mechanism to ensure the security of our high-tech secrets, but we already have such a mechanism in place. The international NATO-based multilateral organisation COCOM already provides just such a mechanism. Indeed, one of my major arguments against United States unilateral action in this area is that it undermines and makes a nonsense of international action by western countries through COCOM. I am glad to note that the Minister agrees.

Neither do I necessarily blame the United States Government for trying it on. They are, after all, only pursuing their national interest, which is what governments are supposed to do. If the Government insist on conveniently lying down in front of the United States Government, who can blame the United States for taking the opportunity to walk all over us?

What now needs to be done in this serious matter? First, the Government must use the opportunity of the European presidency to co-ordinate European action to make it clear to the United States Government that we simply will not accept their extraterritorial claims. In this matter I draw the Minister's attention to the fact that a resolution is now before the European Parliament calling on the Community to reject United States claims. I hope that he will make it clear in his speech that the Government welcome this motion.

Secondly, the Government must make it clear that they do not expect United Kingdom firms to deal with Washington themselves but that, where claims are made, the Government will treat these as matters to be taken up on a Government-to-Government basis.

Lastly, in my view, the Government should insist that all letters such as those put out by IBM, DEC UK Ltd., Texas Instruments and others that seek to impose within the United Kingdom the laws of the United States should be formally, and at the Government's request, withdrawn.

United States attempts to impose its law on firms in Britain undermine the effectiveness of the existing international organisation COCOM; they constitute actions that are inappropriate as between allies; they are damaging to United States-United Kingdom relations at a time when anti-Americanism is becoming all too prevalent in our society; they directly infringe United Kingdom sovereignty; they are illegal under international law; they increase the pace of United States high technology colonisation of Europe and they seriously damage the economic viability and trading capacity of the United Kingdom's already depleted high-tech industry.

The question that the House wants to have answered, after the Government have been doing nothing very effective, is: what are the Government going to do about it?

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'recognising the importance to employment, defence, education and the economy of a strong high technology sector, applauds Her Majesty's Government's actions to support this sector through the provision of a favourable climate for business and through support for research and development; endorses Her Majesty's Government's continuing efforts to prevent, by discussion on a case-by-case basis, the extraterritorial imposition of United States law on United Kingdom firms exporting high technology from the United Kingdom; and supports the Government's initiatives to encourage British high technology industries and their intention during the Presidency of the Council of the European Communities to co-ordinate policies to promote European high technology co-operation.'.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) has raised a very broad subject, which I imagine hon. Members will want to take further in the debate. I look forward, with the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to the possibility of catching your eye, perhaps briefly, to respond to those comments.

The hon. Gentleman has concentrated his remarks on one aspect of high technology, although the motion is quite widely drawn. It would, therefore, seem appropriate to address some of the wider aspects in addition to the points that he has made on extraterritoriality. I share his concern about the cases where extraterritorial difficulties arise, but I want to begin by putting the points that he has made into a broader context.

We have an expanding high technology sector which the Government have taken a number of measures to stimulate and foster. It is an industry that benefits from the multiplicity of commercial and scientific links that this country enjoys with the United States. It is against that wider background that the issues raised by the hon. Gentlman need to be seen.

I shall begin by saying something about United States export controls. We all agree that they represent an important topic. Certainly I welcome the opportunity to restate the Government's position. However, those controls need to be seen in the context of our close links with the United States. They also need to be seen against the background of United States concern, which this Government share, about high technology goods reaching the eastern bloc.

There is, of course, a well-tried mechanism to deal with those concerns in the COCOM framework, about which I shall say something in a moment. I wish to remind the House of the many steps that my Department is taking to make United Kingdom high technology firms less vulnerable in their dependence on United States technology and on sourcing from the United States, by providing support for research and development and strengthening our links with high technology industries in other member states of the European Community, which the United Kingdom currently chairs in its presidency role.

We have very close and harmonious relationships with the United States not only in trade but across the whole realm of defence policy. As the hon. Gentleman has said, high technology is very much an international trade. Of course, we have very close commercial links with many important United States companies that are established in this country; IBM, Ford, General Motors and many others have important British subsidiaries. British companies have a powerful presence in the United States and, indeed, this country is the largest foreign investor in the United States. At present we enjoy a positive balance of trade with the United States.

In high technology this community of interest is reflected in the COCOM arrangements, which have been in existence for nearly 40 years. As the House knows, the arrangements cover exports to Warsaw pact countries and to China of strategically sensitive goods and technology, including those designed for civil purposes but also having military applications. The controls are co-ordinated through the Paris-based COCOM committee which provides the framework for maintaining agreement between NATO countries on the operation of a controlled list of products. True, COCOM is an informal body, but it provides an essential link in co-ordinating the interests of the United Kingdom, the United States and other countries in their approach to high technology exports. The controls we have are our own, of course, and are imposed through the Export of Goods Control Order 1985 which, as the House will remember, was debated in Standing Committee in July last year.

So the problem in a general sense of controlling sensitive technology is not new. In the United Kingdom's view the right way to go about it remains through multilateral co-operation agreement in COCOM. Against that background, unilateral action on extraterritorial claims to jurisdiction is harmful to such agreement. Because the United States is a dominant economic power in the world and a major source of high technology, the extraterritorial nature of its export controls inevitably leads to tension and dispute.

In our view the only law that applies in the United Kingdom is United Kingdom law on which our own controls are based. We reject out of hand claims by the United States Government to have jurisdiction over United States goods or goods based on United States technology while they are in the United Kingdom or when they are being exported from the United Kingdom. If we could compel the United States Government to withdraw this claim the problem could be eliminated easily, but we cannot. We have tried, and will continue to try, to persuade the United States Government to change their policy. Where we judge that it is the right response we shall not hesitate to use the Protection of Trading Interests Act 1980 to safeguard United Kingdom sovereignty.

Mr. Ashdown: If that is the case—and it is the same case as has been deployed before — surely the Government accept that they could ask United Kingdom firms such as IBM and DEC to withdraw those letters. Why have the Government not done that? Why do the Government even accept the possibility that the United States Government should be able to control the movement of the computer owned by the British Government from Harwell to London university?

Mr. Pattie: The hon. Gentleman made both those points in his speech. I shall come to them in my speech.

Other hon. Members may raise the same point as he did about why the British Government do not have more frequent recourse to our powers under the Protection of Trading Interests Act. We have those powers. They were used originally to direct companies in the United Kingdom not to comply with the extraterritorial provisions of the United States export administration regulations in the Siberian pipeline affair. They could indeed be used again, if that seemed the best way to protect overall United Kingdom interests in a particular case. But hon. Members should be wary of the temptation of thinking that use of the Act to impose a general ban on compliance—which could take no account of the commercial and other interests in broad cases—would offer the right solution to the joint problem.

If I may explain, the usual method by which the United States enforces its extraterritorial controls is by blacklisting companies that do not comply, making it an offence to supply them with United States-controlled goods. Use of the Protection of Trading Interests Act could strike at the application of blacklisting to United Kingdom companies; but the main sanction—denial of supplies direct from the United States—would not be touched. The United States reaction to a direct and comprehensive challenge to its law cannot be predicted, but any indiscriminate use of the Act could jeopardise British companies dependent on continued access to United States goods and technology. The Government therefore believe that a case-by-case approach to problems best serves United Kingdom interests. And, unless a major dispute, like the Siberian pipeline affair, makes confrontation unavoidable, the Government consider that in general it is best for companies to be left free to make their own commercial decision as to whether to comply with United States rules.

United States export controls create uncertainty and the extra burden of compliance is a disincentive to sourcing from the United States. That is a factor which, inevitably, companies here have to consider, and it is a point which the United States Government should reflect upon too. It is in no one's interest that the flow of goods and technology between trusted allies should be distorted by unjustified and over-zealous attempts to impose unilaterally another layer of control, bureaucracy and legal claim.

The hon. Member for Yeovil has also urged the Government to refuse to allow United States Government officials to inspect United Kingdom companies for compliance with United States laws. In doing so, he is referring to the proposals by the United States Government to introduce a distribution licence system, under which United Kingdom companies importing United States goods would have the option of applying for the status of approved foreign consignees and so be released from the need to import high technology goods from the United States under individual United States export licences. I put it to the hon. Gentleman that this could be a benefit. But its cost would be that United Kingdom companies' books might be open to inspection by United States Government officials monitoring compliance with the United States rules.

The United States Government have made an approach to us to ask whether we would be ready to countenance such inspections. A proposal that foreign inspectors should visit companies here to monitor their compliance with foreign rules can never be easy. We thought it right, as a first step, to consult our own high technology industries; and I can tell the House that, while not enthusiastic—perhaps not surprisingly—they would not wish to be denied access to the proposed United States licensing facility. To answer the hon. Gentleman's point, that is why we have taken some time. It is very easy to make the instant, emotional response, which is to say that we deny the jurisdiction and therefore we deny the request.

[Mr. Pattie]

But, as has been made clear, the Government are considering the United States Government's request. I can say now that it is not by any means a request that could be granted unconditionally. We should not get our difficulties in this area out of proportion. We see eye to eye with——

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West): The Minister is aware that his hon. Friend the Minister for Trade has written to me on this matter, and I understand that in some respects it is a difficult issue. However, he will appreciate that this is something that the Opposition could not countenance or agree with. Is the Minister saying, because I could not quite follow him, that in principle his Department is now prepared officially to agree to United States Department of Commerce officials coming here to inspect the books of British companies? Provided that the specific case is satisfactory, is the Minister now prepared in principle to concede that major issue of principle?

Mr. Pattie: No, I am not saying that. I am saying that we thought that it was right first to ask the industry what it would like. We have had previous debates on this matter, particularly in the context of the Systime affair. On that occasion I sought to make it clear that it would be to nobody's advantage to take action with or against the United States Government that had the effect of putting a British company on to a particular blacklist, which effectively would mean that it was denied access to the material that it wished, thereby causing it to be put out of business.

I urge the hon. Member for Yeovil and the House to put the matter into a broader context. The Government's view has always been that on matters of this kind the nation's sovereignty should be respected. We believe that United States claims to jurisdiction over re-export are an infringement of our sovereignty and that they are contrary to international law. I assure the hon. Gentleman that this Government will continue to do their utmost to protect British interests, and we stand ready to support any United Kingdom company that in the course of its legitimate trading has fallen foul of United States extraterritoriality.

It was interesting to note that during the hon. Gentleman's speech, with its echoes of the Systime debate, he said that he had received letters. He felt unable to name companies, but he said that he had a list of companies and that he had been in correspondence with them. That is precisely the nub of the problem. We are not saying that companies should deal exclusively with the United States Government, but if the companies who have written to the hon. Gentleman would care to write to me and make arrangements to come and see me, I should be very happy to see them. The practical question is whether or not they are prepared to comply with the requirements of the American multinational companies. That is primarily a question for them. However, the question whether we shall admit United States Government inspectors to carry out inspections is a completely different matter, and we shall not gladly comply with such a request.

The Government asked whether we would consider using our presidency to draw together a European position. We certainly would. This matter is causing concern to our partner countries in the Community, and we could well take an initiative on it during our presidency. We have been considering the matter, and I am glad to be able to respond positively to the hon. Gentleman on that point.

I shall be prepared, particularly if the companies concerned will make representations to me, to examine again the United States circulars, to raise the matter with the various American companies and find out whether they would be prepared to vary the terms of those circulars. The companies that are making these requirements need to be aware of the fact that, although they are established in the United Kingdom and are trading in the United Kingdom—we are delighted to have those companies here; many of them have been here for many years and they make a valuable contribution to our economy — they need to consider whether the continuation of such a policy is in their best interest, or in the interests of the industry in general.

It would help a great deal if there could be a lessening of the dependence of United Kingdom companies on supplies from the United States. One of the ways in which this can be promoted is by developing greater co-operation throughout Europe. As the hon. Member for Yeovil knows, we have developed in recent years a considerable number of programmes. The most recent is the series of EUREKA programmes. As we have the presidency of the European Community, we are taking a very active role at the moment in developing the research and development programme. We shall need to obtain agreement for the European Community research framework programme at the Research Council meeting on 9 December. If we obtain that agreement, it will be quite a major achievement.

As for domestic support, may I make it quite clear that the Government do not envisage activities in Europe—be they in EUREKA or in the European Community research framework programme—ESPRIT, RACE and BRITE — as a substitute for activities in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pattie: May I just develop this point? It is very important for the House fully to understand that the Government are not looking, through greater participation in European programmes, for means of diminishing the national base of research and development. If that were to happen, before very long we should cease to have the ability to participate in these programmes.

When one looks at the support that my Department has given to research and development it is interesting to note that in 1979-80 that support was £143 million and that in 1985-86 it was £440 million—a doubling, in real terms. People write learned articles, or what they claim to be learned articles, alleging that not enough is being spent by the Government on research and development and that this, and this alone, is one of the causes of our problems in the world of high technology and in other forms of technology. I dispute that. Significant sums of money are spent on research and development by the Government, but the problem is that British industry does not spend on research and development anything like the comparable figures that are spent upon research and development by either Japanese or German industry. This country must find ways to encourage industry to spend more on research and development and at the same time to encourage the City to take a more favourable view of investment in research and development.

I do not believe that the problem simply relates to the level of expenditure on research and development. When I carried out my consultations during the run-up to the first EUREKA conference and asked various people in industry what they would like the EUREKA movement and series of programmes to be, it as extremely interesting that they said to me, "Please, not another research and development programme." In their view, research and development programmes are coming out of companies' ears. What they were looking for, and what they have got, is a series of programmes that are close to the market place, that are therefore market-related and that have in view an actual product and a service.

The problem in this country over many years has been not so much the level of our research and development or the amount of innovation, which compares favourably with that of many other nations, certainly in terms of the number of Nobel prizewinners that we have produced, as our inability to exploit our research. We have failed to pull through the science into applied technology. When that is added to the fact that our domestic markets are too small to support many of our high technology firms, it is obvious that United Kingdom companies need to look much more towards European collaboration and markets as the springboard for world markets. Therefore our policies and our industrial research and development expenditure are directed towards stimulating greater European collaboration and a greater investment in research and development by industry from within its own resources.

In Europe, there are some areas of technology, especially over the harmonisation of standards, where there is considerable additional value in having a Community research and development programme.

Under the proposed changes to the treaty of Rome agreed last year, it is recognised that the Community must devote a greater share of its research and development to promoting the competitiveness of European industry in world markets. That has been recognised in the Commission's proposals for a new Community research and development framework. The Government are committed to a gradual growth in European Community research and development and will seek agreement on a new framework programme during the current presidency. The most significant European Community programme is ESPRIT — the European strategic programme for research and development in information technology. The United Kingdom has done extremely well in ESPRIT, being involved in 135 of the 200 projects.

Similarly, my Department proposes to support RACE — another acronym for the research on advanced communications in Europe programme — in which again United Kingdom companies have done well, at a suitable level, reflecting the sharing of collaborative research and development, the opening up of markets and the forging of standards for future telecommunications networks.

The BRITE programme — basic research in industrial technologies for Europe — is also important and allows the more traditional industries to benefit from recent advances in technology.

I have mentioned EUREKA, which is a framework programme involving 19 countries, which seeks to encourage European collaboration on market-led high technology projects, thus helping to increase Europe's competitiveness with Japan and the United States. Seventy-two projects have been announced, 32 of which involve British companies. The EUREKA project information net can help British industry to find partners for collaborative projects and to inform them of other projects in which they might wish to participate. Where firms involved in a EUREKA project discover a market barrier to commercial success, Governments can act as a lobby to resolve that problem. That is one of the most important future developments for EUREKA as a market-opening device to get the internal market that we all wish.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): I wonder whether, in the course of my hon. Friend's further remarks, he might wish to reflect on our success in European Space collaboration. I know that he is following the work that the British National Space Centre has in hand and which looks towards the future, but does he accept that we have a great success story on which we can build, and which will allow us to collaborate with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and with the United States generally?

Mr. Pattie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, although he has anticipated a point that I was about to make. It would be remiss of me if I did not mention the Alvey programme, the second annual conference of which was held just recently at the university of Sussex. It is the largest collaborative programme we have, and it brings together my Department, the Ministry of Defence, the Science and Engineering Research Council, various parts of industry and also higher educational institutes in collaborative projects in four main areas of information technology. Some 187 full industrial projects have been approved, and 116 academic-only projects. Public funds of £200 million are provided by the Government, with the remainder coming from industry.

One of the most successful research schemes of recent years is the joint opto-electronics research scheme — JOERS — which is a pre-competitive joint research scheme between industry and higher educational institutions. The take-up of funds — £25 million — has been rapid with many applications of high quality being submitted. Both the motion and the amendment concentrate on higher technology, and the aerospace industry is a very important user of various aspects of it. In March 1984, the Government provided £250 million in launch aid to British Aerospace in respect of its participation in the design and development of the Airbus A320. By the end of May this year, 134 A320s had been ordered by 12 different airlines. That is encouraging and discussions are taking place on the possibility of support for future members of the Airbus family. Launch aid funding of £60 million has also been provided for the new fuel-efficient IAE V2500 in which Rolls-Royce is participating, and for Westland for its participation in the EH101 multi-role helicopter.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) has said, Government support for space research and development is aimed at creating an industry capable of exploiting the rapidly growing commercial opportunities by producing space hardware, software and services. The British National Space Centre was formed in November 1985. Total Government expenditure on space in 1985-86 was £100 million, of which the largest share, £70 million, was provided by the Department of Trade and Industry. But space development is expensive, and it is therefore essential to work through the European Space Agency. The British contribution to the European Space Agency, administered through the British National Space Centre, was about £80 million, of which the Department of Trade and Industry contributed £60 million. That contribution represents about 80 per cent. of British Government civil space research and development and about 15 per cent. of the total ESA budget.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Am I right in thinking that the director of the British National Space Centre, Roy Gibson, presented his British space plan to the Department of Trade and Industry on 4 July? If so, when does my hon. Friend think that he can make a decision on the basis of the proposals in that document? Will he be making a statement to the House? If not, how will we be made party to that final decision?

Mr. Pattie: No, it is not true that Roy Gibson presented the plan although that was his aim. I understand, however, that I am about to receive it. My colleagues and I in the Department will wish first to consider it carefully and will try to arrive at a decision, which may be taken before the House reconvenes. I should be happy to give an assurance to my hon. Friend that there will be a statement on the Floor of the House, but it would be unwise to do so. I am sure that the usual channels will ensure that a debate takes place if that is the wish of the House.

We are conscious of the needs of small firms, and my Department especially welcomes applications from small firms for the various support programmes that we have. In April this year we announced the small firms merit award scheme for research and technology. It draws openly and unashamedly on the experience of the United States and on what is known over there as the small business innovation research programme, which has worked well. The first two examples will cover the areas of biotechnology and instrumentation for a one-year trial.

It is also important for the House to be aware of the great emphasis that the Department of Trade and Industry places on close co-operation between it and the Ministry of Defence. The Department spends £35 million a year in and through the Royal Aircraft Establishment and the Royal Signals and Radar Establishment at Malvern to provide technical underpinning of aircraft, electronics, information technology and space industries.

We have carried through some important recent developments. Defence Technology Enterprises Ltd. has been set up to license technology in such establishments as the Royal Aircraft Establishment, the Royal Signals and Radar Establishment, and the Admiralty Research Establishment and that has now extended to the Royal Armament Research and Development Establishment. The national electronics research initiatives at the Royal Signals and Radar Establishment bring together researchers from collaborating firms to form strong teams.

I strongly believe in the need to bring the civil sector and the military sector together as often as possible, and that initiative at the Royal Signals and Radar Establishment represents an excellent forerunner of technology transfer programmes to come. The teaching company scheme is an important programme for helping to deal with the problems that the hon. Member for Yeovil referred to in his opening remarks about skill shortages and about improving co-operation between the educational sector and industry. We strongly support the technique of research clubs such as those that I have already mentioned in Alvey and JOERS. That seems to us to be a very acceptable way in which to proceed.

The Government generally believe that high technology and other companies can be assisted by the right economic climate, in which taxation is reduced and devices such as the business expansion scheme are introduced.

On the subject of venture capital it is interesting to note that in 1979 there were only five funds investing £7 million. There are now more than 100 specialist funds investing £270 million a year. That is good news for the high technology sector. We have worked hard across Government to reduce many of the bureaucratic burdens in terms of price, dividend, exchange and many other controls. This is extremely important. Various high technology companies have done extremely well following the privatisation programme, such as British Telecom, Cable and Wireless, British Aerospace, and Amersham International. There is now an upsurge of various companies which are emerging from the academic sector. In that context, it is extremely interesting to note the success of science parks. They have done extremely well, not only in Cambridge but elsewhere, often in contrast to the lack of success of similar attempts in the United States.

I hope that the hon. Member for Yeovil will feel that I have given him good measure in my speech. I fully accept that extraterritoriality is a problem. We recognise that, and are also conscious of the practical difficulties faced by companies that are caught up in such practices. I have given the hon. Gentleman certain assurances, and I hope that he will find them acceptable. The Government are running several programmes to help British high-tech firms to be strong enough to cope with those pressures, particularly through developing co-operation and collaboration with other companies in Europe.

The subject of today's debate is important and I look forward to hearing the views of other hon. Members on matters of common concern. I assure the House that this subject is serious, and that the high technology sector is vigorous and developing. We are very pleased with the progress that it is making.

5.20 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West): I am sure that the Minister did not expect many Opposition Members to be impressed by that complacent recitation of the recent activities of his Government and Department.

This comprehensive motion gives us an opportunity to discuss a matter that has in recent years aroused intense and growing resentment in the country, in British industry and, in particular, among British industrialists. I am sure that the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) will be pleased to know that we shall support the motion standing in his name and in that of his right hon. and hon. Friends.

When we debated high technology on 15 May 1985, it was again against the background of the infamous IBM letter of December 1983, and of the earlier raging controversy over the John Brown Russian pipeline contract. Those, and a growing number of other similar events, have demonstrated the American Administration's now octopodal interference in the high technology trading relationships of Britain with other countries, in addition to the COCOM member states.

Since our last debate, matters have degenerated further. Far from backing off from its claim to extraterritorial and retroactive imposition of United States law, the Reagan Administration seek to extend it and to institutionalise it with a step-by-step policy of effective commercial coercion orchestrated by Mr. Richard Perle at the Pentagon, and encompassing not just the United States Department of Commerce, but the United States Customs and Excise and, apparently, even the CIA.

The latest step to be taken by the United States authorities—the Minister will know about it, as I have been in touch with the Minister for Trade—involves a set of new regulations for the distribution licence, a system of bulk licensing that allows American exporters to export specified goods to approved foreign consignees without the individual transaction approval that the United States authorities usually require.

In his letter of 30 June, I was informed by the Minister that the system is "designed to free the companies concerned from the delays and expense of applying for individual licences."

No-one—not even this gullible Government or Minister—would swallow that. The simplification procedure is nothing more than a sprat to catch a mackerel. The real purpose, long hankered after by Mr. Richard Perle and his associates, is that United Kingdom companies that accept those new regulations would be required to accept audit visits by United States Department of Commerce officials.

Furthermore, as the Minister has frankly admitted to the House, the United States Government have sought this Government's agreement to visits by Department of Commerce officials in order to audit the books of British companies. I asked the Minister whether he had conceded that principle, but I am not sure what his answer was. He seems to be confirming that no such concession will be made by the British Government—[Interruption.] I am trying to put some words into his mouth for him, which he could then use when he replies to the debate.

On behalf of the official Opposition, I say that any acceptance of any such jurisdiction by the Government in order to audit the books of British companies would be utterly unacceptable. It would be tantamount to an official acceptance of the United States' long-standing attempt to have that imposition of American laws on United Kingdom companies accepted. To us, that is unacceptable.

Mr. Pattie: Will the hon. Gentleman address himself to my point, that it is important to take into account the feelings and aspirations of the companies concerned? What would he do if they said that they preferred to continue with the regulations?

Mr. Robinson: I am grateful to the Minister for that intervention. Given the total lack of support given to companies by this Government, I can well understand companies accepting almost anything that would give them some freedom of access to American technology. But the matter should not be approached in that way. The Government should make it clear to British companies that they are standing four square behind them in resisting that unacceptable pressure from America. What would those companies then say? If they felt that the Government were four square behind them and had embarked on a policy of resistance to pressure from the United States, none of them would want to go along with that set of regulations.

As a Minister, the hon. Gentleman bears responsibility for upholding the laws of this country, and he cannot hide behind any temporary commercial convenience. Incomprehensible and feeble as the Minister's position is, he will no doubt try to explain it at the end of the debate.

Following the Minister's intervention, it is even more clear that the Government will not give any categorical assurance. Consequently, we can do little but echo the remarks that have been made about this Government's attitude towards standing up for British industry. Several British business men sought the Government's support in resisting American pressures. They were interviewed in that remarkable "TV Eye" programme, "Uncle Sam's Law". The Minister should consider his intervention against this background. Mr. Colin Hill, a British business man who was under American pressure, sought help from the British Government and from the Department of Trade and Industry. He said:

"our Government is not strong enough. And certainly our Department of Trade and Industry always gives me the appearance of being like a toothless tiger. I mean, all it does is bare its gums at the opposition."

We know that feeling from our debates in the House.

The same point was put later in the same programme, perhaps even more appositely, by another business man, who said that he did not blame the Americans for defending their interests but

"What I do blame is the British Government for being so wet, and frankly so pusillanimous, not to stand up for British interests."

That is the reputation shared by the Minister and his Department. It is time that he did something about it.

But I am asking that of a Government who, in their supine appeasement of the American President, agreed to the F111 raid on Libya from British territory, and am asking it of a Government who have a total lack of faith in British technology or in British managers and workers. They forced through the sale of Westland to the Americans and tried to do the same when it came to disposing of Britain's vital motor vehicle industry to General Motors and Ford. Consequently, there is not much hope of support for British industry from this Government.

It is not to be wondered at that a Government who are opposed to the very idea of an industrial strategy for a high technology centre should be so wet, half-hearted, hesitant and lacking in self-confidence when it comes to opposng the United States' attempt to impose extra-territorial law on trade in critical high technology components which is being conducted by British industry.

But even if we resisted the Reagan Administration's most overt attempts to ride roughshod over our commercial interests — we could perhaps do that occasionally on a case-by-case basis—as long as that American law stands, the problems experienced so acutely in recent years by the microcomputer industry would persist. I accept that point. I agree with the Minister that we must deal with the real world as we find it. We must be tough about it, not supine.

I would put one question to the Minister. If there are cases where it could be considered to be illegal, especially in the conduct of some American companies or even American agencies such as the CIA—perhaps there is no evidence for that—and the Pentagon and so on, is there no case that we can take to the International Court? Are there no grounds on which we could seek a legal resolution of a problem which seems irresoluble other than by legal action? Even if we do all the things which were valiantly called for by the hon. Member for Yeovil, it will not solve the problem. Even if we get the letters revoked or have Government-to-Government confrontation instead of confrontation of the Minister and a United States Department of Commerce official, I promise the hon. Gentleman that it will not solve the problem. I leave it with the Minister. He should not be as afraid to take on our strong and powerful allies as he appears.

The history of the international relations of the United States Department of Commerce has shown it to be sensitive to actions that call into doubt the exactitude of American commercial behaviour. Nothing showed that better than the action we took on American steel imports which quickly made the Americans rescind the legislation that we considered directly infringed the rules of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. I do not necessarily expect an answer from the Minister tonight. I am sure that our correspondence on these matters will continue. We are definitely looking for a much more vigorous and determined pursuit and defence of British national interest than he or his Department have shown to date.

That can only be half of the issue. The second part of the motion must not be dominated by the first part. What is needed, beyond the negative defence of our interests to the best of our abilities, is a positive and determined British effort to build up a British and European high technology base to lessen, as rapidly as possible, our dependence on United States technology. For once, there is no alternative. However, instead of pursuing that course with vigour and a real commitment to British science and technology, the Government have preached the value of low-wage service industries and boasted only of their commitment to the creation of a low-tech and even a no-tech economy. The fearsome prospect for the country is that in this one area the Government are likely to have achieved their policy objectives. The whole of the distinguished British scientific community has felt so threatened that it has launched a Save British Science campaign supported by over 100 fellows of the Royal Society, 11 Nobel laureates and a substantial number of vice-chancellors and presidents of learned societies.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): The hon. Gentleman will be aware that some of the leaders in that campaign, especially one I debated with on radio, were unaware of the amount of money that the Ministry of Defence spends on research and development every year. He did not take that into account and that is nonsense because of the importance that it has for high technology.

Mr. Robinson: That is a valid point. This country spends far too much on defence-oriented research and development and has done so for far too long. The ignorance of that fact on the part of one fellow of the Royal Society or a supporter of the Save British Science campaign in no way detracts from that. Indeed, the continuing heavy commitment to defence research and development explains why vital areas of civil research and development, including those represented among the co-ordinating committee and supporters of the campaign, are being sadly neglected. Later in my speech I shall give the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) some examples from the campaign literature which I am sure he has seen but has not found time to read.

I should like to deal with one more of the Minister's arguments. It is becoming tiresomely familiar to all hon. Members. The argument goes along the lines that, although we have a long and distinguished record of basic scientific research, as a nation we have failed to capitalise on British inventiveness by translating the research into marketable products for world trade. That is a fair representation of how the argument goes. It is my view that we trumpet rather too much about our scientific research and its successes. In that area, as in many others in today's world of rapid and extensive development, there can be no room for such complacency.

Even if we accept, for the sake of argument, that Britain has done well at fundamental scientific research and less well at exploiting it, it is utterly perverse logic to argue that we should cut basic research, which is what we are doing. It is perverse to argue that by hacking to pieces what we are good at and by chucking overboard decades of priceless scientific fundamental research, we would be able to improve our record in exploiting it. The argument does not begin to stand up.

The attack on British science is part of the Government's attack on the whole educational framework of the country. Its consequences are felt in the critical shortage of mathematics and physics teachers in our secondary schools, in the shortage of electronic, computer and engineering graduates from universities and colleges of further education and now in the haemorrhage to posts abroad of many of our most brilliant research graduates.

As I promised, I shall give a few examples from the Save British Science campaign document. It gets better with rereading. One example deals with inorganic chemistry where, in the assessment of one of the fellows of the Royal Society,

> "'the best of the British inorganic chemists in the age group 30-45 are now employed by American universities of high repute.'"

A further example comes from the head of an important department of Glasgow university. The extent of the move abroad, the brain drain of British research, is quantified in this way:

> "Of our 15 British Ph D graduates since 1981 only 3 are working in science within the UK; 10 are in the USA and one is in France."

One further example is about a lost "new blood" appointment where a "superb candidate" according to the head of department, was being interviewed and was offered a place in Lancaster physics department in the area of experimental low-temperature physics. The reasons given by the superb candidate for not taking up the offer, as set out in the document by the head of department, were as follows:

> "I understand that the reason for his change of heart lay not so much in the inadequate salary per se—although this doubtless played a part—but in the belief that the British university system was being allowed to collapse . . . (he will) continue his career in North America."

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Some of the facts from the university of Southampton in the latest University Grants Committee allocations for departments that are really making their way in scientific and development work, show that the university got £750,000 and it raised £13 million by doing outside work in science and development. I do not think that the denigration of our universities is helpful.

Mr. Robinson: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's remarks concerning the university in his constituency are well noted. I shall refrain from telling him about the outstanding record of Warwick university in my city. If the hon. Gentleman cares to check, I think that he will find that there are some quotations from Southampton making the same points. It is not me who is making the comments but those who are working in British universities and are concerned about maintaining and developing British science in the universities.

The hon. Gentleman should address to those concerned his queries and remonstrations as to whether documents of that kind are harming science. I am sure that he would be rapidly convinced to the contrary. If he reads the report again he will read the conclusion:

"Our conclusion is not only that damage has been done but that some of it may now already be irreversible. The lead even in technologically important areas of research has been allowed to slip to other countries."

The Government are presiding over a brain drain of Britain's top scientific talents, the extensive damage of which will be felt over the next decade and beyond, when it will become clear that Britain has wasted a golden opportunity to capitalise on its strong research capabilities, and to play a leading role in the creation of the new technologies on a Europewide basis.

We accept that the scale of resources required for research and development, as well as the size of the homogeneous market required, will mean that the organisation and exploitation of the next generation of scientists and technologists must take place on a European scale. That is why, from the beginning, we have supported ESPRIT and RACE and BRITE. The Minister also referred to RACE and BRITE, which are lesser-known but still very useful European projects. We condemned the Government when they dragged their feet over the EUREKA project when it was initiated by the French. Equally, we welcomed the Government's change of heart and the backing they are giving to EUREKA during this important period of the British presidency of the Community.

What continues to puzzle us—I hope the Minister will address himself to this when he replies—is how we shall sustain a high profile active role in Europe if the overall funds from the Department of Trade and Industry and Government support for innovation and other schemes, are not increased. The Minister has refused to tell us whether the funds will be increased and if so by how much. He will be aware that a good deal of anxiety persists in industry as to whether the Government will continue to support ESPRIT and more importantly, EUREKA. Such support will require new additional money to be found from the existing DTI budget at the expense of other national programmes.

The Minister made it clear that he did not consider the European projects as substitutes for national projects but he has been extremely coy about how much money the projects will cost and whether there will be adequate money for both sets of programmes. I have raised this matter with him on a number of occasions, most recently at Question Time on 18 June 1986. With regard to the companies participating in the European projects, he gave me the assurance:

"we are not talking about alternative or substitutional activities. It is important to put that on the record."—[Official Report, 18 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 1019.]

He put that on the record again today.

If that is the case—industry will be relieved that it is so—there must be new additional money for EUREKA. Following the completion of the Bide committee's report later in the year there must be new and additional money for Alvey. I urge the Minister not to postpone the new funding which is urgently required on Alvey. He will be aware of the immense damage that was done by the five-month moratorium which was introduced—I give him the benefit of the doubt—prior to his taking over his position. Later in the year, industry and universities will be looking to the Government for urgent and positive decisions on Alvey.

If we consider the scale of Government resources needed, I draw to the Minister's attention two instances which give us some idea of the scale of competition which we will face. On 1 July, when the latest EUREKA project was announced—to a general welcome, as the Minister said — the Financial Times stated that the French Government expected to pay 40 per cent. of the near £400 million which French companies are expected to spend on EUREKA. That is the scale of the French involvement. It comes on top of the five times greater spend by the French on electronics. German expenditure on support for electronics is running at over three times the British level.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley) rose——

Mr. Robinson: I will give way in a moment.

The Minister has said that he is committed to additional programmes and in his reply to me during a recent Question Time, he gave a commitment to meeting industry's requirements for EUREKA. Can he tell us where the money will come from, how much it will be, and what he means by "satisfying industrial requirements"?

Mr. Oppenheim: I thank the hon. Member for giving way. A moment ago he said that the French Government spend five times what our Government spend on their electronics industry. Is he aware that a vast proportion of this is spent to make up the losses in the nationalised French electronics industry? It was nationalised in the 1980s and previously had been profitable, but it is now making massive losses and is costing the French taxpayer a huge sum of money.

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Member is not aware that French research and development represents 3 per cent. of its gross national product. Since the war, the French have had a long successful tradition of Government-backed research and development in industry through to bringing products on to the market. In many ways France has set a pattern for us of what can be achieved by positive collaboration between Government and industry. That is anathema to this Tory Administration.

My attention has been drawn by that intervention to the French microelectronics industry. I am sure that the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim), when he intervened to so little effect, overlooked the fact that when the three major semiconductor manufacturers—Thomson of France, Philips of Holland and Siemens of Germany — met in June this year to discuss joint research and development on advanced technology needed to design and make microchips in the late 1990s, no British company was invited. A couple of years ago when the French and German Governments were holding talks about industrial co-operation — talks that led to the important plans for the key design and production technologies wich western European semiconductor makers will need in order to be competitive with the Japanese and the United States in 1995 — the Conservative Government of Britain were venting their bitter spite against any form of public or private co-operation by crippling INMOS as an independent British producer.

The result of the Government's attack on British research and development, their inadequate funding for national and joint European projects, their failure to harness the power of public purchasing for the purpose of developing British technologies is evident, in its cumulative effect, in the massive deficit that we now face on our balance of trade in information technology products. The deficit on the balance of trade has grown from £384 million in 1980 to no less than £2·3 billion in 1984.

The Minister may take some comfort from the apparent stabilisation of the deficit in the past couple of years, but he will know, as every expert will tell him, that the situation is getting worse.

The recent Advisory Council for Applied Research and Development publication which dealt primarily with software and of which the Minister is so fond, also addressed itself to the growing critical deficit in information technology. It projected that, by 1990, we shall be facing no less than a £9 billion deficit on our balance of trade in information technology products. What are the Government going to do about it? We do not expect an answer from the Minister, because the harsh truth is the Government do not know what to do. If the Government wanted a plan, they are forbidden one anyway and above all, whatever is done must not involve any further expenditure. [Interruption.]

I am aware that many Members wish to speak, and I will certainly make haste, I wish to consider two documents which have recently been published by ACARD — "Software: a Vital Key to UK Competitiveness" and "Exploitable Areas of Science". These documents, which have brought together experts in different areas, make it clear that what is lacking in Britain is a coherent strategy for the development and exploitation of science and technology. These experts cannot bring themselves to say that, as they are contorted by the need to observe Thatcherite semantics. The criticism has been dressed up in the process of consultation, and despite the evidence of recommendations in the software report, the document states that there is no need for Government intervention or subvention. Yet it is clear that six of the principal recommendations of the report need direct Government intervention and indirect Government subvention.

Rather than set up a planned, independent procedure for the valuation of British science, the Government have sneaked through, in a Cabinet Office document, a science and technology assessment office. Nobody is clear as to the exact purpose of this office. It is significant that, on the same day that it was announced, Mr. Fairclough let slip in his evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology that the Government had announced £5 million further cuts in their research funding. No doubt Mr. Fairclough has only just started.

The combination of the Prime Minister's craven subservience to President Reagan and her pathological antipathy to constructive Government and industry co-operation make it impossible for the country, under this Government, to develop and carry through a coherent industrial strategy.

Such a strategy must be driven by three engines of recovery — research and development, training and investment. In all of those the Government have a major role to play. The next Labour Government are pledged to those policies, which will halt the decline of British science and high technology. The implementation of those policies awaits only the sure and certain victory of the Labour party at the next general election.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): I congratulate the alliance on choosing this important topic for debate. I must confess some surprise that the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) took an important but narrow point in the motion. I was hoping that we might be given a little insight into the Liberal party's policies on information technology.

I want to know whether the Liberal party has moved on from the days of the Lib-Lab pact when, as the House knows, it supported the Labour party when it spawned the National Enterprise Board when the Government of the day went out to pick high-tech winners.

I take the strictures of the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) slightly awry when I think of the companies that were chosen. The names of those companies that went bankrupt should be inscribed on a brass plate so that politicians can constantly look at them and be reminded of their own fallibility. I do not know how many tens of millions of pounds it cost the taxpayer, but it was a great number.

Having said that, I recognise that we need a balanced and dynamic programme for high-tech research, if Britain is to maintain its position as an industrial power. For any country to have a high-tech policy it must have an efficient communications system to communicate data throughout the country and, if required, on through the rest of the world.

For that reason, Conservative Members should take considerable pride in the fact that we brought about the improvements in British Telecom by its privatisation. We did that just in the nick of time. The delays in installation, the poor quality and the few choices of equipment were becoming a scandal. There was no way that the vast sums of money needed to bring about the new systems could have been generated out of earnings and the Treasury was reluctant to find such vast sums of money from the taxpayer. As we know, there is no way that the value added network services, which are now doing such a valuable job throughout Britain, could have been allowed without the liberalisation of the system.

It is interesting to note that the parties responsible for the debate tonight had their usual voting pattern on that measure. Some voted for it, some against it, and some abstained. I think that that covers all the possible options. For the record, I should point out that BT is now providing the Treasury with £1·3 billion a year, near enough double what it was producing when it was a nationalised industry. That point should be repeated time and again.

I hope that, when the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) replies, he will mention what he sees as the future of BT if and when the unlikely event occurs that the Social Democratic and Liberal parties have a say in its future.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that under the new privatised regime, domestic telephone charges have gone up?

Mr. Page: Yes, they have, but the formula is such, as the hon. Gentleman knows, that the overall bill has not changed and, if inflation continues to fall, telephone bills will come down.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does not my hon. Friend also agree that telephone bills have always gone up? I can never remember them coming down.

Mr. Page: Yes, that is a fact of life. The only thing that I have noticed recently that has come down in price has been the second-class stamp.

I have already pointed out what would happen if the Government started to try to second-guess the market place. But there is no doubt that, if we are to remain an industrial power, our industries must be willing and eager to embrace the sunbelt sector.

The predictions of the market for information technology and electronics vary, but everybody agrees that, whatever the figure, it will be huge. To secure a fair slice of that market, the Government have already played an important role in encouraging companies to introduce new technology into their methods of operation and the CADCAM and robotic programmes are examples of what they have already done.

In addition, as my hon. Friend the Minister has already mentioned, in 1983 the Government launched the biggest collaborative research programme that Britain has known since the second world war — the Alvey programme, which has pulled together the universities and companies to combine theory with the demands of the market place.

As my hon. Friend knows, that programme comes to an end in 1988 and talks are already taking place on Alvey mark 2. I appreciate that there must be an evaluation of the effectiveness of that programme, but I want to echo what has already been said by Opposition Members. I hope that my hon. Friend will announce his decisions as soon as possible, for a variety of reasons. One is that research teams take a little time to put together. They cost money to bring together, and, as their programmes come to an end, they want to know whether they will have a continuation or whether that is the end of the line for their project.

Let me make one further suggestion to do with Alvey clubs. At the moment, there is a general feeling that there has been a little too much emphasis on the supplier input rather than on the user input. I hope that when my hon. Friend comes to make his decisions on that point he will bear that in mind. The field of opportunity is probably larger at the moment on the user side than on the supplier side.

The vital role that Government have to play is to ensure that the United Kingdom competes successfully with the other two major powers, the United States and Japan, who have not only been making most of the technological discoveries that have recently been brought before us but have been bringing them to the market place with great effect. That has led our Government to seek the support of our EEC partners and with it a market potential to match that of the competition. That could be the answer to the extraterritorial question. If we have our own continental alternatives, we shall not have to go down the route of all the legal hassle and argument with the United States.

As has already been mentioned, one of the participating programmes is that of ESPRIT, which is similar to the Alvey programme, and must be the way in which the huge investments needed for this type of research can be found. The other, which puts a more commercial face on research, is EUREKA. Any collaboration must have an end in view — a product that can be bought by the customer, particularly in the EEC, and, I hope, in the rest of the world. I am glad to hear that my hon. Friend emphasises the need to exploit those discoveries.

The hon. Member for Coventry, North-West made great play of the Save British Science campaign. It has its particular arguments, but he did not read out — this is why the Alvey programme is successful — that the theme of the Government's pronouncements on research is that support depends upon perceived economic benefits. If we are to compete with the rest of the world, we must make a product that will eventually be bought. Vast sums for pure research that have no financial benefit at the end of the day cannot be funded for ever. I believe that the EUREKA programme is attacking the matter in exactly the right way.

The theme running through the speeches of Opposition Members is the desire to become involved in the use of taxpayers' money, whether by way of nationalisation — another phrase that is used now is "social ownership" — a national investment bank, which is rumoured, or the new technological enterprise corporation. That still adds to a severe case of the politicians' disease of them knowing better than the experts in the industry. I hope that the Government will follow the path of providing support but not of going into the realm of endeavouring to pick winners. I believe that Government can only lay the ground rules and create the framework. British people and British companies will provide the growth, wealth and employment for the people of this country.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): A great deal of the debate has focused on the information technology industry. That industry is important to my constituency. For example, IBM, which employs 2,900 people, is the biggest employer in my constituency. That company, along with National Semiconductor, generates work for thousands of people.

I wish to widen the debate a little and talk about the United Kingdom's offshore oil and gas industry and the problems that it faces. With your favour, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the title of the motion — "Defending British High Technology Industries" — allows me to do so. The Government's amendment refers to the defence of British high technology industries. The offshore oil and gas industry must be one of the most advanced industries. On 24 June, the Minister of State, Department of Energy told the Scottish Grand Committee:

> "The industry is taking the lead, particularly in offshore technology, not only in our own continental shelf but in other parts of the world." — [Official Report, Scottish Grand Committee, 24 June 1986; c. 3.]

I would not dispute that comment. It is an important industry to Scotland as well as to the United Kingdom.

[Dr. Norman A. Godman]

The Scott-Lithgow company in my constituency is building one of the most technologically advanced semi-submersible rigs ever built for drilling purposes in deep water.

The low oil price since the end of 1985 has led to a marked reduction in exploration and appraisal drilling and the deferment and delay of the development of new fields in the North sea, although no significant reduction in production has taken place. A survey of oil company intentions by the Grampian regional council this year suggests that the downturn in development activity will last throughout the whole of this year, 1987 and 1988. That report, commissioned by the Grampian regional council, suggests that there will be an upturn in 1989 and that there will be a large increase in activity in 1990 and into the 1990s.

The problem with such a projection is that the three lean years of 1986, 1987 and 1988 almost certainly mean that a considerable capability that has been built up in the oil service and supply sectors in the United Kingdom, especially in Scotland, will not survive to 1989 to enjoy the benefits of an upturn in the market. Scotland is already seeing the redundancies coming through. Britoil recently declared redundant 400 of its employees in Glasgow. Forty of those employees were senior technologists and managers. The company gave them an hour to clear their desks.

Aberdeen, which is an employment bright spot in Scotland—male unemployment is less than 10 per cent., which is a vastly different position from that which exists in my constituency and others on Clydeside — is suffering redundancies in the oil and ancillary industrial organisations. An upturn in the market in 1989 will encounter severe shortages in local services and supplies, leading to rapid price inflation and a greater dependence than hitherto on overseas supplies.

My intervention is a plea for a temporary amendment to the tax regime in respect of the North sea, which might help to even out the cycle, to the long-run benefit of the oil companies, the services and supply industries and employment in Scotland and the United Kingdom.

At the moment, oil operators offset the development costs of a new field against the petroleum revenue tax payable on production from that field. However, the oil companies need money up front to develop the field first. Since the drastic fall in the oil price, those companies are saying that it is a simple shortage of cash that is causing them to defer or delay developments in new fields. For my constituents and the rest of Scotland, that spells disaster. If orders are not made, the fabrication yards, the engineering industry and the information technology industry will suffer.

One change to the present tax regime that might help to overcome the problem would be if the oil companies were allowed to offset the development of new fields against the petroleum revenue tax that they are currently paying on existing production from other fields in the North sea. Such a tax regime would provide the oil companies with the money to carry out new development. In order to ensure that the United Kingdom achieves some additional benefit from such a change to the tax regime, it could be limited to projects approved after the announcement of the change and the costs incurred on the projects before the end of 1988.

By that means, the gain to the companies would accrue only to new projects brought forward and implemented later this year, in 1987 and in 1988, not to existing projects already under way, and only to expenditure incurred in that period. That might be a substantial encouragement to some oil companies to bring forward into 1986-88 projects that would not otherwise be developed until after 1989. The state would not necessarily lose tax revenue because it would accrue a tax revenue from the new field. The tax take could be rescheduled from 1986-88 to 1989 and onwards.

There may be some loss of revenue to the extent that the new fields would yield less tax than existing fields. The net outcome for the Treasury would need to be calculated on the basis of likely effects of the tax change and the tax profiles of particular fields. The advantage of such a proposal is that it would directly address the need for cash up front to develop the new fields. Being for a limited period only, it would be a direct incentive to bring forward deferred projects. The limited time would also ensure that the tax concession would be operative only where there was a gain in activity. Also, the delay or loss in tax revenue implied by the proposal would be kept to a minimum by the limited time period.

Given the drastic fall in the price of oil, Scotland, in particular, faces massive employment problems. The industry, including its ancillary activities, is one of the most important and technologically advanced that we have. It has a huge market potential overseas wherever oil exploration takes place on continental shelves or even in much deeper waters.

A positive response is needed quickly from the Government to prevent those worsening circumstances leading to much higher unemployment in the bright spots of the Grampian region.

6.10 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I shall not seek to follow the remarks made by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), although they are relevant to my speech. He described adequately and with force the impending decline of Britain's first-class sub-sea industry unless drastic measures are taken. I wish to contrast that possibility of decline, which we all hope will not happen, with the undoubted possibilities of expansion, profitability and scientific return from an enlarged space programme on the part of the United Kingdom.

My hon. Friend the Minister briefly alluded to the United Kingdom's space programme in his opening remarks and referred in particular to the inauguration of the British National Space Centre at Farnborough, which has borne fruit under his stewardship. I give full credit to my hon. Friend for that event because it brings us in line with our French and German counterparts, and will enable us to play a better co-ordinated part in the European Space Agency's programme for the next 10 years, which was decided at the ESA ministerial meeting in Rome in December 1985.

The space progammme for Europe, which my hon. Friend approved, was extremely important strategically for the United Kingdom and Europe. Our expenditure on space is to be increased by some 70 per cent. over a 10-year period. Many key decisions were made. One such decision was that we are to continue the development of Europe's launcher capacity through Ariane 5. If the full potential of Ariane 5 is to be realised it should be a man rated vehicle, and this possibility was to be studied. I understand ESA's latest decision is for a preparatory programme to study how Hermes, a manned vehicle to be carried by Ariane 5, could be constructed. It is not merely a question of simple evaluation. It is a concrete programme to prepare for the launch of Hermes. The launch date for Hermes will be in the middle of the next decade.

Furthermore, the breakdown of funding for Hermes was approved in principle at the June meeting of ESA. If reports are correct, the French are to assume 50 per cent. of the responsibility and the Germans 25 per cent., leaving a further 25 per cent. to be divided among the remaining nine ESA members.

The House will recall that the United Kingdom was in the forefront of launcher development. We unilaterally developed Blue Streak, initially as a ballistic missile system. Following the cancellation of the Blue Streak missile, it was adopted by the European Launcher Development Organisation as Europe's satellite launcher. Some eight launches were achieved and then, regrettably, Europa, as it was known, was cancelled. Since then, the United Kingdom has been out of the launcher business.

However, British Aerospace and Rolls-Royce have put to the ESA our proposals for a revolutionary re-usable horizontal take-off and landing vehicle, designated HOTOL, with an exciting new power plant, the commercial potential of which is so great that it must be classified. The power plant is both air breathing in the lower layers and rocket-powered in exo-atmospheric flight.

I do not see HOTOL as a direct competitor to Hermes, but it is important that the British National Space Centre and the Government in their inputs to ESA secure the ultimate development of HOTOL by ESA. I do not think that there need be a conflict with Hermes, which is a more immediate programme. The technology of Hermes is less advanced and its systems less sophisticated than those of HOTOL. To support Europe's participation in the NASA space station — this is a key element in ESA's 10-year programme — the Columbus module, primarily to be constructed by the Germans and Italians, will be the central European element. The European module and European activity in support of the NASA station will require a manned re-usable vehicle, and Hermes could have real merits.

There are two essential deficiencies in the European space programme. First, until now we have not had a manned space programme of our own. The United States and the Soviet Union recognised the key importance of man in space, which has enabled them to mobilise public opinion and political support for the ambitious programmes they have pursued. The Soviets recognised that to an extreme extent through the development of the Soyuz series of vehicles. They intend to place a permanent manned space station into orbit, probably in two or three years' time. Indeed, Commander Leonid Kizim, the present commander of Soyuz 15, is the first astronaut who has spent over a year in space. He reached that point on 5 July 1986. Another Soviet cosmonaut, a flight engineer, has completed 361 days in space. Clearly, the Soviets have long experience of sustained manned space flight operations, not merely for the greater good of Marxist-Leninism, but for sound strategic purposes. The Soviets' space programme is essentially military in nature.

I hope that the lack of a manned element in Europe's space programme will shortly be remedied through Hermes and HOTOL. It was a shame that Squadron Leader Nigel Wood, who was to have been the payload specialist for the launch of Skynet 4, has had to return to the United Kingdom following the decision to launch Skynet 4 on Ariane. We want an independent European manned space programme, not just that European astronauts should fly on the shuttle, as was done by the German payload specialist for Spacelab, or the French astronaut Chrétian with the Soviets. We need an indigenous, autonomous, European manned space programme. Secondly, we must develop the full potential of space technology for our European defence.

The Federal German Minister for Defence, Manfred Wörner, has been at the forefront of efforts to push the European members of NATO towards the development of a European strategic defence initiative. Lieutenant General Jim Abrahamson was in this country yesterday on his way to Brussels in an attempt to goad the Europeans into a more active participation in the strategic defence initiative—and rightly so in my judgment.

In no area is European participation more important than in the development of short-range systems to protect Europe from the growing threat of SS21, SS22 and SS23 ballistic missiles situated in the western military districts of the Soviet Union and in Czechoslovakia and East Germany, against which at present there is no defence. The current negotiations — on intermediate range and strategic nuclear arms reductions — do not cover these weapons.

As part of the European input to the strategic defence initiative, I hope that we will do all that we can to play as full a part as possible in the development of these short-range, defensive, anti-ballistic missile systems which, in this exposed and much threatened continent, we badly need.

In conclusion, I see the need for an expanding European space programme with an enlarged British participation. It could be a major engine for economic growth and above all for the development of new high technology industries. To their credit, the Government have made significant steps in the right direction but their commitment in financial terms has not matched their good sense in political judgment.

If Roy Gibson's national space programme is approved, we are likely to see a doubling of the British space commitment which runs to the tune of some £100 million at present. However, we spend £40,000 million on social security. A lot of the money goes straight down the drain. If we compare that prodigious expenditure with the paltry amount which we invest in space—the technology of mankind's future—we can see the lack of proportion in our expenditure priorities. I commend the amendment and I hope that the Government will do more in the area of space technology to create an enlarged and more effective European space programme.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I am glad that we have selected this topic for debate. It is natural that the topics raised reflect a wide range of interests, and these have ranged wider than the terms of the motion. Nevertheless, we have heard interesting comments from hon. Members on both sides of the House.

[Mr. Michael Meadowcroft]

It is interesting that we are talking not simply with hindsight. The present position was predicted some time ago. I have always been impressed by the comments of the French Liberal, Servan-Schreiber, who, in his book, "The American Challenge", which was written almost 20 years ago, described what would happen if we were to follow the path that we have followed in the intervening 20 years. He remarked at the time:

"If Europe really wishes to escape American domination, there is only the way of federalism and social justice."

He went on to state:

"If Europe is not to be defeated in this battle of computer manufacturing, it must unify its efforts under a single command."

The high technology industries are a perfect example of the problems that we face in endeavouring to compete fairly on an international scale. Supplies within our industries are dominated by huge United States corporations backed by the extraterritorial application of United States export laws, mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). In some cases, there have been questionable trading practices. It is extremely difficult for smaller United Kingdom companies to challenge this market domination. It is not impossible for them to do so on the basis of a lack of imagination or technical knowledge. In a sense, the Americans wish to restrict and constrict the market for our companies because of the excellence of some British innovations. If it had not been for the fact that some American-based companies were fearful of what would happen if there were fair competition with the United Kingdom, I doubt whether they would have wanted to exert the pressure that they have on British companies.

The Minister commented on the Systime problem, which we raised in an Adjournment debate in February. I received a response from the Minister of State yesterday, and my colleagues and I are carefully considering our response to it. Under the United States Freedom of Information Act—their system is somewhat better than ours because it enables us to obtain material on these matters — we have received copies of the documents involved in the recent case in which Systime was fined a substantial amount of money by the United States Department of Commerce.

When I received those documents, I was interested to see, contrary to what I had fondly imagined, that the case against Systime was not against the United States subsidiary of Systime UK but was directly against Systime Computers Limited of Millshaw park, Leeds 11. It is astonishing that the American Department of Commerce —the documents are available and clearly state this— should seek to impose its legal jurisdiction on a United Kingdom company in that way. As I understand the law, if Systime wanted, it could have refused to take part in any conduct of that case. It could have walked away and claimed that the department had no jurisdiction over that company.

As the Minister made clear in his opening remarks, the problem is that if companies do not believe that the Government will defend them against such extraterritorial intervention, there is no way that a company can hope to survive without submitting. Unless a company can continue to receive supplies, it cannot trade. Companies do not have the cash flow or resources to enable them to carry out a long battle with American companies. Therefore, rather than fighting under such circumstances, they can do nothing but give in.

The Minister wondered whether companies wanted to go on to a blacklist. It is astonishing that the Government accept that there could be a blacklist for our companies. I accept that that is the reality, but throughout this debate we have asked what the Government will do to make such a blacklist ineffective. We know that such a blacklist will exist and we know of the existence of export denials of companies that export in this country. We know that that happens and that efforts are made to continue that process.

The American Government will continue to push against the door to open it as wide as possible to affect our industry. Will the British Government try to close that door? At present, we believe that the United States Department of Commerce is pushing against an open door. That increases interference week by week, month by month. The Minister also questioned whether it was better for a company to be consulted to discover whether it wanted to take part in a process of the Americans examining its accounts rather than taking part in the licensing process. The Minister appears to be prepared to allow commercial companies to decide whether sovereignty is waived. It is astonishing that a Conservative Government, who pride themselves on a belief in sovereignty, could allow such a discussion to take place.

There is far more freedom for smaller companies to contest against larger companies in the United States than there is for United Kingdom companies to defend themselves in this country against United States companies. Emulex, which trades in this country but which is American-based, has managed to win concessions out of DEC in the United States which it could not possibly have won had it fought under United Kingdom law from this country.

The Minister has asked for examples of such cases and I noted his stricture to my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil about confidentiality and anonymity. It is no wonder that companies are not anxious to have their names broadcast when they are worried about future restrictions on supply. On that basis, I can quote an example, but, as we are in the real world, I dare not give the name of the company. A letter that I received on 22 April states:

"All our activities are approached with full support of the Board of Trade and with all necessary UK Export Licences, but now we find ourselves in the crazy situation where our activities are illegal with regard to the American Government. To give you an example, we took an order from a Singaporian customer for £500,000 worth of computer system which we had put together using American components: this was in November of last year. We got the UK Export Licence within seven days, and at the same time applied to the Department of Commerce in Washington on the infamous ITA699P 'Permission to Re-export Application'. Our customer had been approved by the Singaporian Government, and yet we are still waiting for the US Licence to be approved. As a business decision we shipped the order, and as a result we have won follow-on orders from this customer."

That is a United Kingdom high technology business that has fought its way in an overseas market. It said that to make sure that it was able to fulfil that order and get repeat orders, it had to ship illegally according to the United States Government. That is unacceptable.

Are we being anti-American by raising such points? If any of us are concerned about our relationship with the Americans and the development of our relationship not only on a governmental level but between our different peoples, it is important that we warn our American friends and allies when we feel that they are doing things that are harmful to that relationship. It is no friend or ally who sees the Americans heading towards greater bitterness and distress from what they are doing in this country without warning them that that is happening. That is why it is crucial that we debate the matter today before it goes further.

In view of what was written 20 years ago and what we have said on numerous occasions in the House and outside, I believe that unless there is a united European market, and unless there is united European co-operation on those matters, there is no way that we can stand up to the Americans' desire to involve themselves in our market for the sake of maintaining their own economy. I believe that the United States economy is in deep distress. It has cumulative problems, and it seeks to maintain the American dream by looking at other places where it can develop. Unless we in Europe are prepared to say that we have a strong, powerful and effective industry and that we have resources that the Americans might want to use, it will be impossible to prevent the blacklist and the extraterritorial export rules. This is all about being able to compete fairly. That is all that the customers, the clients and the companies with which we have been involved wish, but we do not see the British Government standing up for their rights.

6.32 pm

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): One of the Opposition's consistent themes is that our information technology industry is doing badly. They say that it is doing badly simply because there is not enough Government money to support it. It is true that some of the raw statistics show that the deficit in our IT products trade has been growing, although it has been stabilising recently. However, of course that deficit has grown, in the same way as the whole sector has grown. The IT deficit is also growing at a far faster rate in Europe and, indeed, in the United States, which went into deficit on its IT products a couple of years ago. Looking at the raw statistics hides the fact that in many areas of our information technology and electronics industries we are doing exceedingly well. Where companies are making good quality products and taking the trouble to go out into the world, and go to Japan and sell them, they are prospering.

The Opposition claim that the Government have no strategy in information technology. Let us have a quick look at what the Opposition's strategy is. Their policies rely on two major pillars — more money and more Government control and intervention. The Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson), looked to the French as an example of successful intervention in industry. He could not have chosen a more disastrous example if he had tried. In the 1950s, the 1960s, the 1970s and the 1980s the French Government poured billions of francs into the French electronics industry. In the mid-1960s under de Gaulle they encouraged the merger of CII and Bull, and later they brought in Honeywell as well. That was a disaster. When the Communist-Socialist coalition came into power in 1981 the Government nationalised the French electronics industry and encouraged the merger of Thomson Alcatel and CGE. At the time they promised that employment in the French electronics industry would double. In fact, it has fallen by 25 per cent. and the French electronics industry is in a disastrous state. What is more, it is costing the French taxpayer billions of francs every year.

However, we do not have to look across the water. We can look at the policies of the Labour Government when they were in power in the 1970s. They tried the old interventionist, dirigiste themes. We had the National Enterprise Board. One of its favourite companies was one called Nexos, which has recently been the subject of an investigation by the Public Accounts Committee. Nexos was meant to be Britain's answer to IBM. With Government support, the politicians and the civil servants were going to create a British IBM. What happened? Nexos went bust a few years later, having cost the taxpayer £40 million. During its brief reign it succeeded in importing vast quantities of Japanese office equipment. It managed to import more Japanese facsimile machines in one year than could be sold in the whole of the market. When the company finally went bust it still had on its books 1,000 of those Japanese facsimile machines. The British Technology Group, which took over from the NEB, had to sell those machines, which had been bought for more than £1 million, for £1—not £1 each, but £1.

Mr. Randall: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Oppenheim: I apologise. I cannot give way as time is short.

I attended the debate in the House a few years ago on technology, in which many Opposition Members praised INMOS, which is another of the NEB's creations. At that time INMOS was riding on the crest of one of the biggest booms that the electronics and microchip industry has ever seen. Obviously, it was doing well then. Since then, unfortunately, it has sunk into great losses. Although many people admire its transputer products and other products, the fact is that, unfortunately, it is not doing very well in selling those products on the world market.

What is Labour's new policy? Its new policy for the 1980s and 1990s, should a Labour Government be elected, involves renationalisation of British Telecom. What a pathetic, backward-looking policy. Our privatisation of British Telecom has been one of the most successful policies ever carried out by a Government in this country. It has meant not only that the workers in that company have a share in the company, but consumers have a better deal and the Government are getting more money from the company. The fact is that under Labour, when the General Post Office ran the telecommunications system, if one wanted to buy anything from the telecommunications side, and if one wanted an interview with a sales representative, it was almost like trying to get an interview with the Pope. It was almost impossible to get anything. Businesses had to bribe telecommunications engineers to get the essential equipment that they wanted into their companies.

If those policies are implemented in the late 1980s and the 1990s, we shall have the same results as those policies produced in the 1970s. We shall have a vast waste of public money and demoralisation of our industry because of the simple fact that Opposition Members, with their lack of business experience, have not learnt that politicians and civil servants simply cannot run private industry. It is as simple as that. They have not learnt that lesson.

Opposition Members say that the Government have no strategy for the information technology industry. They do have a strategy. It relies on creating the conditions in which businesses can prosper. Our IT industry is no different from any other of our industries in that regard. It needs the same preconditions for its prosperity. It needs long-term pro-enterprise policies, stable prices, good industrial relations and quality in management, which is allowed to manage its company, and above all it needs profit. Of course, "profit" was a dirty word under the Labour Government. The countries that have done best in information technology—the United States and Japan—have followed those policies consistently for the past 30 or 40 years.

As we are all aware, Britain does not have an especially large market compared to the Japanese or the United States home markets. It is unfortunately true that we do not yet have a full internal market in Europe. Unfortunately, a number of non-tariff barriers in Europe prevent us from selling our equipment on the European market, especially the telecommunications market. In many ways, those tariffs are illogical. For example, tariffs on fully assembled computers or sub-assemblies are higher than tariffs on the imported components. Clearly, that is a disincentive for British manufacturers to get their goods assembled onshore. That is why companies such as Amstrad and Apricot have to get much of their equipment assembled offshore.

Time is running out. I believe that this Government have done more to encourage the IT industries than any previous Government. Their policies are forward-looking. If there is another Labour Government—I hope that will never happen—we shall be back with the stale old ideas and policies that have failed before in this country and abroad.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): It is regrettable that the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) did not dwell more on the role of the subject of the debate, which he at last reached in his final sentences. I shall comment on one point made by the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) about British telecommunications. Clearly, that industry is central to the development of high technology and all industry. It is regrettable that the question of the renationalisation of British Telecom has been raised because of the Labour party's recent pronouncements and the decision of the court in Strasbourg as a result of the British Government's action.

The waiting list for telephone equipment and handsets was ended not by privatisation but by liberalisation and the introduction of competition. British Telecom might give better service to its customers, offer more competitive prices and be more efficient if there were even more competition than the Government allowed under the British Telecommunications Bill which was introduced to privatise telecommunications. Competition, not privatisation, has brought about better service for the consumer.

The debate has ranged widely between the constituency interests of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), who has apologised because he had to leave to go to his constituency, and the future of the space industry, which was raised by the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). I agreed with many of the remarks by the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood about the development of the space industry. Unfortunately, he spoilt them by his references to spending on social security. He slightly over-egged the pudding. He ignored the small contribution—2 per cent.—that we are making to the European Space Agency. The development at Farnborough is excellent and I hope that it is built up and strengthened and will work in co-operation with the ESA. I hope, too, that British Aerospace's work with HOTOL is successful and can be integrated in or at least co-ordinated with the work in Europe.

The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood did not mention the excellent work on satellites by British Aerospace. One of our major contributions on space has been through the work of British Aerospace and other companies on satellite technology. We have been involved in European as well as other rockets.

I wish to refer to the core of the motion and debate. Over a long period, my hon. Friends the Members for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) and for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) have vigorously pursued this issue. The House and the industry owe them a debt for the vigour with which they have pursued it. They have displayed their interest and knowledge of extraterritoriality—United States law restricting British companies and high technology development in this country.

We are saying two things. First, the United Kingdom is doing badly in high technology. It cannot afford this impediment to progress of British companies in high technology. Secondly, it is unacceptable in principle that United States law should be used in the way described by the lawyers of the Crown as an unwarranted encroachment on our territory and contrary to international law. An analogy can be drawn with our battle with the United States over the imposition of unitary taxation. I was part of a delegation which recently went to make representations to the United States Government and Congress about that issue. Once again, United States law was used in a way that penalised British companies, outside all the conventions of international law, and operated basically on the basis of "might is right". We should be saying loudly and clearly that we are not prepared to accept that.

We are doing badly in high technology. I believe that all hon. Members will feel that the response by the Minister for Information Technology to my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil was disappointing and displayed tremendous complacency in the light of the damage being done and the weaknesses of our high technology industries. The crude balance of trade for information technology has widened from a deficit of £468 million in 1979 to £2·4 billion in 1984 and £1·8 billion in 1985. For microelectronics, the trade deficit widened from £13 million in 1979 to £645 million in 1984 and £565 million in 1985.

We have dangerous levels of import penetration in a number of key respects. For example, it is 57 per cent. in electronic data processing, 67 per cent. in office machinery and 24 per cent. in radio/electronic capital goods. One could go on citing key aspects where the level of import penetration is disastrous for our industry.

An article in today's Financial Times estimates that 70 per cent. of the crucial European software market is dominated by the United States. The Government have not been able or prepared to take action to reverse that pattern.

The major subject of the motion is the unwarranted encroachment by United States law on our companies. It is intolerable—I hope that the Minister will recognise this and reflect it in his language—that businesses are being impeded by having to wait for up to three months for licences from the United States Department of Commerce. What is the Minister prepared to say—he did not respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil—about the United States preventing the Government from moving a computer from Harwell to London university? What will the Government do about that? Do they accept it? Are they prepared to tolerate it? What have the Government said about it to the United States?

Companies which are being impeded by this extraterritorial action would be given some hope if the Government were at least prepared to do more on their behalf. They are in an impossible position. I am afraid that one concluded on listening to the Minister that he was prepared to allow companies to be put into a position in which they fundamentally have to give way to blackmail. They face the threat of being put on a blacklist, of losing business and of not being able to obtain and to export products if they do not accept the legislation of the United States Government. That is unacceptable.

Companies are not strong enough to take on the whole of the United States Administration. In many instances, they are not even strong enough to take on the bureaucracy and expense involved in going through that whole rigmarole. That is doing enormous damage. When the Minister replies, I hope that he will go much further than he did in his earlier remarks and give hope to companies that have been hit by this requirement of the United States that the British Government will fight in a way that we have not seen to date.

There is a well known, well recognised and possible way of resolving the problem with the United States. Everyone knows that the answer is to go through COCOM in Paris. There was no need to go down the road that the Government chose. That route was inappropriate and there is the possibility that relationships between the United Kingdom and the United States will be impeded and interrupted, but we must make it clear that we shall be a thorn in the side of the United States unless it is prepared to take action. That was the message that was taken to the White House and the United States treasury on unitary taxation. I hope that Ministers will make it clear to the Department of Commerce and Congress that good relations will be impeded unless the United States Administration is prepared to act.

The Minister has an opportunity this evening to give that message loud and clear to the United States Administration and to give hope to the companies that have been hit. He can make it clear that the Government will give them backing in fighting the requirement. We must demonstrate that might is not right and that we are not prepared to be blackmailed, whether the blackmail comes from individuals, from institutions or from a Government.

Mr. Pattie rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the Minister have the leave of the House to speak again? I take it that he has.

6.52 pm

Mr. Pattie: We have had the extensive and wide-ranging debate that was foreshadowed when it began. I am sure that alliance Members realised that it might range far. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) talked about the transformation of the performance of British Telecom and raised various matters concerning the Alvey programme. I can confirm that the user aspect will be emphasised when we come to examine the Bide report. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) talked about space, about which he knows a great deal. As I said to him in an earlier intervention, we await with interest the plan of the British National Space Centre, on which we shall take decisions in the near future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) correctly assessed by the less than entirely successful position in France caused by interventionist policies over the years. He reminded us of the considerable benefits and improvements in the performance of British Telecom. I have received a message from the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) that he has had to leave the Chamber to return to his constituency. The matters that he raised about tax regimes for offshore oil companies, for example, are not for me. They will, however, be referred to the appropriate Department.

The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) was right when he said that it was not simply the creation of British Telecom that had produced improvements and a dramatic increase in performance. He omitted to say that liberalisation and competition are part and parcel of the same process. We cannot have liberalisation and competition unless we create something in the nature of British Telecom in the first place.

The hon. Member for Stockton, South referred to the excellent work on satellites that British Aerospace carries out. This reference was characteristic of the thoughtful speeches that the hon. Gentleman makes in the House.

The hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) always gives me some problems. I make notes and address myself to his reasonable arguments, only to find that suddenly he changes gear and produces a stream of complete gibberish. That is one of his specialities. I prepared myself to respond to his question about whether we would delay taking a decision on the Bide committee's follow-on to the Alvey programme. The answer is that we shall not. We shall want to take a decision as quickly as possible once the Bide committee has reported in October. When I was making that note, the gibberish began. There was a series of rapidly uttered non sequiturs — for example, the assertion that Westland is being sold to the United States. Such assertions make me wonder where the hon. Gentleman has been.

The hon. Member for Coventry, North-West spoke about France. It seems that he, like many others, thinks that everything that is done in France is marvellous. He said that France spends more as a percentage of its GDP on research and development than we do. In fact, France spends 2·1 per cent. of its GDP on research and development and not 3 per cent. as he claimed. We spend more as a percentage of GDP as our spending amounts to 2·3 per cent. The hon. Gentleman should concentrate a little more on getting his facts straight.

To be fair to the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West, he was the only Member to participate in the debate who referred to the International Court of Justice and a juridical outcome. He was saying, in effect, "How about Her Majesty's Government taking the United States to the Court of Justice?" Further research would have told him that the United States has decided, on the basis of Nicaragua, I think, that it will not be party to any actions brought in the International Court of Justice unless it agrees that it will accept the jurisdiction. There is no point in anyone inside or outside the House wringing his hands about that. We accept that we are faced with a serious problem, and what I would call the juridical route is not open to us.

The hon. Member for Stockton, South listed various examples of import penetration and added that most of it involved the United States, without being prepared to say that that does not put us in a very strong position to take the crusading attitude that he would like us to adopt. He told us that, with others, he went to the White House and bearded the Congressmen in their den on Capital hill. That is great, and I applaud his efforts. If penetration of our market by the United States has reached the extent that he claims—I do not refute any of his figures—that does not put us in a very favourable position to take a strong line on behalf of British companies——

Mr. Ashdown rose——

Mr. Pattie: No, I shall not give way.

Mr. Ashdown: Deal with the Harwell computer.

Mr. Pattie: Very well. The impression has been given by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and others that nothing is being done, and that every time the United States talks about the moving of the Harwell computer to London university we say, "That is fine. There is no problem." We are making the most urgent and strenuous representations——

Mr. Ashdown: It is the Government's computer.

Mr. Pattie: Discussions are in progress now. If the hon. Gentleman listens, I shall answer his questions. The computer is in the United Kingdom and there is a service, maintenance and enhancement contract.

Mr. Ashdown: It is your computer.

Mr. Pattie: The contract is with an American company. Even the hon. Gentleman, with his incredible stupidity, will realise that we must take account of a contract. What is the position if the United Kingdom Government or a university want to move a computer and the company which has supplied it says, "If you wish to move it, you will have to break down the computer and comply with the agreements that have been made."? We do not like that and we are having discussions with the United States Government. They are not taking place on the Floor of the House for the benefit of the hon. Gentleman or of anyone else. To suggest that nothing is being done is a travesty, and I want to take the hon. Gentleman to task. The Liberals and SDP have decided to base their case on what could have been a wide-ranging debate on a very important topic; they have decided instead to base it on a very narrow point, and have not proved their case.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. James Wallace and
Mr. John Cartwright.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House, recognising the importance to employment, defence, education and the economy of a strong high technology sector, applauds Her Majesty's Government's actions to support this sector through the provision of a favourable climate for business and through support for research and development; endorses Her Majesty's Government's continuing efforts to prevent, by discussion on a case-by-case basis, the extra-territorial imposition of United States law on United Kingdom firms exporting high technology from the United Kingdom; and supports the Government's initiatives to encourage British high technology industries and their intention during the Presidency of the Council of the European Communities to co-ordinate policies to promote European high technology co-operation.

Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill (By Order)

Order for further consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill, as amended, be now considered.

7.24 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Last night I was rather disappointed that I sat here for the full three hours of the debate but was unable to catch your eye before the promoters of the Bill moved the closure. I make no complaint about that, but it leads me to think that it is possible that the promoters will seek to move the closure on this first group of amendments some time between now and 10 o'clock. I put it to you, and through you to the promoters, that it might be a little unusual if extra time were to be found for the Bill, in view of the very large amount of parliamentay time that has been consumed by it so far. If the closure were to be moved tonight, it would make it extremely difficult for the promoters to negotiate with those Opposition Members who are a little tired of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill and wish to produce an agreed Bill that might come back to the House at a later stage.

It would be very difficult for the House if new clause 2 were to be defeated tonight as part of a deal with some Opposition Members. I put it to you that it might lead to better progress in the long term if the House did not rush to a speedy vote tonight and if an opportunity could be provided for further negotiations to take place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The hon. Gentleman has raised a number of points, one or two of which are hypothetical. It is not for me to communicate the hon. Gentleman's views to the promoters, but I am sure that his views will be communicated in one way or another.

The hon. Gentleman's question relating to new clause 2 is entirely hypothetical and will be a matter for the judgment of the Chair, in the light of the circumstances.

New Clause 2

CONSENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE REQUIRED FOR CERTAIN WORKS

'(1) The Company shall not exercise the powers conferred by Section 6 of this Act without first obtaining the consent in writing of the Secretary of State in any case where—

(a) the works include works of land reclaimed, and

(b) the area of land which is to be reclaimed is to be used for purposes which require close and convenient access to a berth which is to be constructed within the area of jurisdiction of the Company.

(2) The Secretary of State shall give his consent under this Section in any case where he is reasonably satisfied that—

(a) further development of the land which is to be reclaimed will be commenced not later than one year after the date on which the works of reclamation have been substantially completed;

(b) no reasonable alternative site for that further development is available on other land within the area of jurisdiction of the Company; and

(c) the area of land to be reclaimed is no greater than that which is reasonably required to accommodate that further development.

(3) Where an application has been received by the Secretary of State from the Company for his consent under this Section, the Secretary of State shall, within the period of eight weeks following that receipt, give his consent or notify the Company of his decision to withhold it.

(4) A consent given under this Section shall come into force as soon as it is given and shall remain in force for a period of one year or for such longer period as may be specified by the Secretary of State when he gives his consent and the duration of a consent so given may, at any time before its expiry, be extended for such further period or periods as the Secretary of State may specify by written notice given to the Company.'.—[Mrs. Ann Clwyd.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this new clause it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 6, in clause 3, page 4, line 9, leave out 'or any land reclaimed,'.

No. 8, in clause 6, page 5, line 33, leave out 'enclosing an area of 95 hectares'.

No. 9, in page 5, line 39, leave out from 'and' to end of line 41 and insert 'contained within the limits shown on the deposited plans and described as "Limits of deviation of work"'.

No. 10, in page 6, line 1, leave out from beginning to end of line 5.

No. 11, in page 6, line 2, after 'above', insert 'and subject to the consent in writing of the Secretary of State for the Environment,'.

Mrs. Clwyd: I should remind hon. Members of the contents of new clause 2. Subsection (1) reads:

"The Company shall not exercise the powers conferred by Section 6 of this Act without first obtaining the consent in writing of the Secretary of State in any case where—

(a) the works include works of land reclaimed, and

(b) the area of land which is to be reclaimed is to be used for purposes which require close and convenient access to a berth which is to be constructed within the area of jurisdiction of the Company."

Subsection (2) provides:

"The Secretary of State shall give his consent under this Section in any case where he is reasonably satisfied that—

(a) further development of the land which is to be reclaimed will be commenced not later than one year after the date on which the works of reclamation have been substantially completed;

(b) no reasonable alternative site for that further development is available"—

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): It is quite unnecessary for the hon. Lady to read out the entire new clause, because every hon. Member has it in front of him and is able to read.

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Surely it is in order for my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) to read out the text of the clause. I take it that there is nothing in Standing Orders that prevents my hon. Friend from doing so. Could we have your ruling on that point?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): If the hon. Lady had been out of order, I should have pulled her up, but what was said by her was in order.

Mrs. Clwyd: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It was perfectly in order, because during last night's debate it was quite obvious that some Conservative Members had not read the report of the main discussions that took place in Committee on the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill. It is proper that they should be reminded of what we are trying to do.

The new clause continues:

"(c) the area of land to be reclaimed is no greater than that which is reasonably required to accommodate that further development.

(3) Where an application has been received by the Secretary of State from the Company for his consent under this Section, the Secretary of State shall, within the period of eight weeks following that receipt, give his consent or notify the Company of his decision to withhold it.

(4) A consent given under this Section shall come into force as soon as it is given and shall remain in force for a period of one year or for such longer period as may be specified by the Secretary of State when he gives his consent and the duration of a consent so given may, at any time before its expiry, be extended for such further period or periods as the Secretary of State may specify by written notice given to the Company."

Mr. Weetch: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Under-Secretary of State for Transport is listening to the debate, and presumably monitoring points about it for the Government, but most of the points that we shall discuss tonight will not be about transport. They will be very much about the environment. Is it in order to ask for the presence of a Minister from the Department of the Environment so that we can have some sense when environmental points are answered?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows very well that who is on the Government Front Bench at any time is not a matter for the Chair, but I have no doubt that his comment has been heard.

Mrs. Clwyd: My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) has made a good point, because the fundamental purpose of the new clause is to subject to the authorisation of the Secretary of State for Transport reclamation works of a primary nature which might otherwise take place well in advance of the company's need to construct new berths under the powers in clause 6. Our point is that the company has been given powers to do some work, but that monitoring by the Secretary of State for Transport and his Department is not enough. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich said, we need, in addition, the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Clause 7 seeks to place a restraint on the deposit of any material of "more than three years before the start of construction of the quay,"

or parts of the quay. We believe that three years is too long. Furthermore, valuable though it is to deal with peripheral dumping, clause 7 is full of weasel words. It requires the company to give notice to, but not obtain the authorisation of, the county and district councils which have legitimate local interests in the matter. We hope that clause 7 will receive support from both sides of the House tonight.

The powers sought by the company have a direct bearing on matters of more than local interest. They have an impact on several areas of national policy. Last night we heard much about the national importance of the development at Felixstowe docks. In Committee, we discussed national docks policy, national landscape conservation policy, in view of the adjacent area of outstanding natural beauty, and national nature conservation policy because of the damage that will be caused to a site of special scientific interest. The European Commission will take an especial interest in that site because of the United Kingdom's legal responsibilities under the directive on the conservation of wild birds.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): Has the hon. Lady ever been there?

Mrs. Clwyd: Yes.

Mr. Rhodes James: When?

Mrs. Clwyd: Is this a dialogue, Mr. Deputy Speaker? I answered yes.

Mr. Weetch: My hon. Friend has just given way to an intervention from a Conservative Member. I am glad that my hon. Friend has been there. Does she know that the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) has described the area as a grotty piece of coastline? If the hon. Gentleman has described it in those terms, it is outrageous that he should show this synthetic concern and intervene in that way, trying to cause my hon. Friend the maximum embarrassment. It is disgraceful.

Mr. Rhodes James rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot intervene in an intervention.

Mrs. Clwyd: Those of us who served on the Committee on the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill, even for a relatively short time, were well acquainted with the arguments put forward by the environmentalists and had considerable sympathy with them.

Amendment No. 11 seeks to require the authority of the Secretary of State for the Environment for works which involve the enclosure and reclamation of the seabed, the river and its foreshore. I understand that it is a normal provision of port and harbour legislation for the authority of the accountable Secretary of State for Transport to be required for such works. Section 12 of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Act 1968, entitled does just that. That provision is expressly re-enacted in clause 10, and provides an additional safeguard for other persons whose navigational interests might be affected by such works.

But who is to provide safeguards for our wildlife? Hon. Members spend many hours legislating to protect property and user rights, but we too infrequently protect the rights of other creatures or the rights of citizens to enjoy them. We are considering an area that attracts birds, and which is a national asset. We are asked by the people who support the development to allow wide open powers to a private company which intends only, as we heard so often last night, to serve its own financial interests. In so doing it will destroy thousands of birds of all descriptions which come to Britain in winter from many parts of Europe, and from Iceland, Greenland and Canada.

In European Community terms the area is recognised as warranting special protection in law. If, against the arguments of Labour Members tonight, the Bill passes into law substantially unchanged, it will almost certainly run into difficulties with the Commission in Brussels. All too often the Government have got into difficulties with the European Court of Justice and have been brought before it on some issues more frequently than many other countries. If we run into those difficulties with the Commission, there will be no long-stop power in the hands of the Government to halt damaging reclamation activities being carried out by the company while proceedings are taken against the United Kingdom in the European Court. As Department of the Environment Ministers must answer charges which undoubtedly, if the Bill proceeds, will be laid against the United Kingdom—not simply in court but in the Council of Ministers—it is appropriate that long-stop powers should be placed in their hands. Our amendments seek to do that.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I rise to support the new clause and amendments. If I thought that this Bill would lead to the construction of a new dock within the next 12 or 18 months which would in turn create many new jobs, I should be happy for it to be enacted. But there is no evidence that it will create new jobs. The best that the promoters can claim is that it will create new jobs in Britain at the expense of jobs in Europe. Others say that it will take jobs away from Britain. Whatever the case, I can see no evidence for the Bill creating new jobs.

Until I have some evidence that the Bill will create new jobs, I can see no justification for a proposal that will damage the natural environment. We all have a responsibility to try to balance protecting the environment with the need to develop jobs and industries. I have always thought that we have a duty to try to leave the environment in as good a state as we inherited it from previous generations.

Mr. Rhodes James: The proposals involve 500,000 new trees being planted and 85,000 acres of additional woodland. Is that bad environmental practice? Moreover, the doubling of a dockland surely involves jobs.

Mr. Bennett: I thought that the hon. Gentleman had listened, like me, to last night's debate. It was forcefully pointed out then that the different types of environment are important. It is worth protecting these mudflats, because they attract certain types of birds. Trees may be attractive in certain places, but they will not provide a suitable environment for those birds. On occasion, I have severe reservations about the number of trees that are planted. Some of the Forestry Commission's areas do not enhance our natural environment at all. If there is to be a new development, let us screen it and make it as attractive as possible, but that does not mean that we would be improving the environment. We would merely be trying to screen the damage from others.

As I have said, genuine new jobs would be one thing. However, I understand that the promoters claim only that they are trying to take jobs away from Rotterdam or from other European ports, so we are not creating new jobs but merely moving unemployment around——

Mr. Rhodes James: Employment around.

Mr. Bennett: One can say that we are moving unemployment around, or the reverse of that, which is that we are moving employment around. The promoters argue that the development will take jobs away from Europe and give jobs to Felixstowe. But we rightly argue that it will take jobs away from Tilbury and elsewhere. No one has said that jobs will be created. There is a tendency for products to be smaller in size, so the number and size of items is falling. Consequently, as I have said, there is no evidence that the Bill will create new jobs.

Mr. Weetch: Does my hon. Friend realise that the port of Ipswich will be an early casualty of that dock extension? Before the Bill began its passage, I had detailed discussions with the trade unions and management at the port of Ipswich, and they are very worried about the employment consequences for Ipswich. The Bill would bring excess dock capacity to East Anglia, which would mean that dog would eat dog, and the port of Ipswich could become a ghost port in 15 or 20 years.

Mr. Bennett rose——

Mr. Deputy-Speaker: Order. I have allowed the hon. Gentleman to go reasonably wide of the new clause; I am sure that he is now rapidly coming to the subject of the new clause, and the amendments associated with it.

7.45 pm

Mr. Bennett: I was trying to talk about the new clause and the amendments, but in passing I wanted to point out that I would have been sympathetic to the Bill if it had created new jobs. My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) has just pointed out that it is likely to take jobs away from Ipswich. That brings me to the new clause, because we now come to the environmental argument. If new jobs were going to be created, it might be worth sacrificing some of the environment. But that is not so, so there can be no excuse for sacrificing wetland areas and mudflats.

Sadly, dock developments have been allowed along the east coast of England and Scotland, and habitats have been destroyed. Recently, proposals came before the House that would affect Seal sands in the Tees and Hartlepool dockland area. Opposition Members resisted those proposals, but there was a great disappointment. Indeed, a much stronger case could be made for creating jobs in Middlesbrough or Hartlepool than for creating them in Felixstowe, but with the support of Conservative Members and with the encouragement of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, we fought hard to protect those wetlands. Substantial parts of the same sort of wetlands have gone for docks at Hull and Immingham, and all the ports round the Wash have gradually gone for reclamation schemes.

Therefore, there have already been many demands to take away the natural habitat of birds that use those estuarial areas. The same sort of habitat has also been lost along the Thames. A lot of work has been done to enclose land round the Solent in preparation for developments that have not taken place. There were proposals to extend that work, thus affecting——

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your advice on a matter of importance to the House and of relevance to the new clause. It has been raised with you previously, but having thought about the issue, I realise that we are placed in a special difficulty. It is on record in the minutes of the Committee that the Secretary of State for the Environment said that there were certain detailed conditions which were relevant to the site under discussion. He then added that only proven national interests and a lack of alternative sites could justify any exception from what he said in 1982, in support of a site of natural beauty.

From my experience in the House I know that, technically, I am not quite in order. But a voice has to be heard and courtesies have to be established so that the Chair can consider the point that the House is in a weak position, because we cannot challenge a Minister from the Department of the Environment. That is an important point, and I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Transport will consider it. But I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for hearing me, as I know that I am technically not quite in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has dealt with his own point of order. He has raised a point of argument and not a point of order for the Chair, as he himself has virtually admitted.

Mr. Bennett: That was a very interesting point of order. Those of us who served on Committees under the guidance of my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) would have been pleased to get away with one like that.

We have lost a lot of similar estuarial land along the coast to port authorities that have every intention of developing it for extra port facilities. On many occasions, having carried out the reclamation, they have found that the economic circumstances have changed or that their future plans were too grandiose and they have not gone on to develop the dock or put the containers on to the site. They have stopped halfway through the process. Therefore, we have lost the natural environment but have not gained any jobs or docks.

Mr. Rhodes James: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has read clause 16 of the Bill.

Mr. Bennett: I have read clause 16.

The current proposal is that the company will carry out reclamation on the basis that, within three years, it will continue the development. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will accept that in three years all sorts of circumstances will change. I am not casting any aspersions on the integrity of the Tees and Hartlepool dock authority or the dock authorities at Immingham, Yarmouth, Tilbury, Southampton or Falmouth. All the people involved in those docks genuinely believed when they reclaimed land that they would be able to expand their port facilities and attract new jobs. All I am saying is that the evidence is that it is not as easy as that.

Unfortunately, at Southampton a considerable amount of the estuary was reclaimed with every good intention, but at present the land has not been used for dockland. It is logical, having enclosed the land at Southampton and taken it away from the birds, to let that harbour develop rather than run the risk of taking away more land at Felixstowe, with a question mark over whether the development will take place.

The new clause is to ensure that the company has to satisfy the Secretary of State that within a year it will go ahead with the development. That is a reasonable test of sincerity. I accept that even within a year circumstances may change. However, at least there is a reasonable possibility that the development will take place. Of course, there is always the risk that the reclamation will go ahead and that at the end of that period there is a financial crisis within the country or the company or a change of circumstances which leads the company to decide that it will not go ahead with the rest of the development.

The new clause says that to allow that risk over 12 months may be reasonable, but to allow it over three years is a little unreasonable. I would not be particularly happy about a development that took jobs away from other ports but I am sure that I should be very unhappy about reclamation taking place and then, at the end of two or three years, the company announcing that it could not go ahead with the development.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: It would follow, in the purely hypothetical circumstances that the hon. Gentleman is postulating, that the promoters would have provided the new nature reserve, the many new environmental improvements, the tree planting and so on. Is the hon. Gentleman not able to recognise that even in the strange circumstances he describes, there would have been an environmental gain?

Mr. Bennett: I am not certain about that. Unfortunately, I am not a specialist in biology, so I cannot say whether the particular species of birds that use the mudflats at present will find the alternative proposals at Trimley marshes as attractive. I am certain that other birds will find it as attractive and I am also certain that some birds will find the trees attractive. However, the area was designated as a site of special scientific interest because of particular wading birds. The problem we face on the east coast is that it is that type of environment which is continually being taken for dock development or development associated with it. If the circumstances I described had occurred and the alternative land and trees had been provided, we may have had some environmental gains. However, if the land has been reclaimed and the jobs do not materialise and the dock does not develop, we have lost an environment which is at present attractive to the particular groups of migratory birds that use it.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): My hon. Friend, with some modesty, says that he is not an expert, although he is well known for his expertise in these matters. It may help if I quote the advice of the Nature Conservancy Council, which is the Government's official adviser on things natural. In its comments on this proposal, referring in particular to grey and ringed plover and turnstone it says that it has

"advised the Department of the Environment that there are no sites on the Orwell estuary with features comparable to those at Fagbury Flats and that the passage of this Bill would prejudice Britain's international obligations towards nature conservation."

Although my hon. Friend may not be able to reassure the House, I hope that the House will be reassured by the Nature Conservancy Council which, as the nation's guardian of the environment, feels that the flats are irreplaceable.

Mr. Bennett: I thank my hon. Friend. It certainly makes the case and answers the points made. Even if we got all the things that the company is saying it would provide for the environment, welcome as they are, they would not solve the problem of the area that is being lost.

My concern is that, once the land has been reclaimed, it cannot be restored as mudflats. Therefore, one suspects that if at some point the company is not sure whether it should go ahead, as the Bill stands it will go ahead and reclaim the land. At the moment the company has only to take the view that it would be reasonable to develop the docks within three years. At the end of those three years there is no way in which the House or anyone else can compel the company to go ahead and develop the dock if it decides that circumstances have changed. It can come back to the House to ask for a variation in the legislation and there is nothing that we can do in legislation to stop the company coming back.

The company can go ahead, reclaim the land, provide the environmental amenities it has promised and, if it decides not to go ahead with the development, it can stop. The company can then leave the reclaimed land, as much other reclaimed land along the east coast of Britain has been left, in an almost semi-derelict state. It may attract other birds and animals but not those that have been displaced. The company can then let the matter rest for several years before deciding to go ahead with the development.

The company can decide that, because of the change in trade, perhaps brought about by the Channel tunnel, that it will never want to go ahead with the development. What would the company do? It would have a piece of reclaimed land on which it had spent a considerable sum of money, so it would have to look for ways to get the money back. The temptation is to use the land for some other purpose, such as a light industrial development or something else. It may be that the company would have to come to the House to get new legislation or it may be that it decides it has to go to the county council and apologise for taking the land, saying, "We know that it was of special scientific interest; however, at the time we had every intention of going ahead but, sadly, we were unable to. It would be a pity if we lost our money and it would be a pity for the local community to lose jobs. Let us use the land for some other purpose." That is the risk at the moment. If the company can say that it has every intention of going ahead within three years, it can do so, knowing that, if having reclaimed the land it becomes uneconomic to go ahead with the development, it can come to the House or go to the planning authority with a proposal to use the land for some other purpose.

The House would not have dreamt of allowing the company to reclaim this sort of marshland if it was to be used for light industrial purposes. The House would have insisted that there were lots of other sites within Felixstowe or East Anglia to use for that purpose. All we are seeking with the new clause is a safeguard so that there is a high probability that the land will be used for the purpose that the promoters are putting forward rather than a risk that, because of the passage of time, the very good intentions of the promoters will be thwarted by economic circumstances.

Mr. Rhodes James: The Bill ensures that 176 acres of Trimley marshes are preserved. The promoters and others will guarantee a sum of £145,000 to ensure its preservation. That is written into the Bill. How can the hon. Gentleman object to a Bill which, in my view, is unprecedented and which gives that kind of guarantee?

8 pm

Mr. Bennett: It is not a guarantee of like for like. One is taking away something which was prized in Europe—the wetlands area—and one is giving people something else in return. People are not objecting to this attractive alternative but it is an alternative; it is not a replacement, and that is the problem.

I am certainly not complaining because the promoters are offering something else, but they are not offering back the same environment. My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) read out an article which made the point that something else is being offered in exchange for the land. I can think of many cases when I would like to have traded an environmental improvement in one place for some damage elsewhere, but that does not justify the damage. We must have a certainty that the damage is absolutely necessary. So far I have not had that proof. No one has been able to convince me that the development will create new jobs. I have grave doubts that, over three years, circumstances will remain exactly the same to enable the promoters to carry through their undertaking, given in the Bill, to develop the area.

There are many uncertainties, especially concerning what will happen to ports policy in this country as a result of the possible building of a Channel tunnel. The future is difficult to forecast, and the Government are reluctant to predict the changes. Southampton is upset about the Channel tunnel, but what will be the reaction in Dover? If harbour activities are reduced at Dover because of the tunnel there will be tremendous pressure in Dover to try to grab some of the container work. Nothing would be more logical than for ships to put in at Dover, offload and bring containers into Britain. The containers could then go back through the tunnel to Europe. It is certain that Dover will fight for that work. Will shippers be encouraged to come to Britain or will they be encouraged to go to French ports and send goods through the tunnel? The future is extremely difficult to predict.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): I am very interested in what my hon. Friend says about the capacity of our existing ports to handle existing cargo. He may be interested to know that the port of Dover, both in volume and value terms, shifts more cargo than the port of Felixstowe. If we are to have a fixed link of some description, clearly the movement of cargoes through our ports will be seriously affected. I believe my hon. Friend is absolutely right in questioning whether or not the existing volume of cargo will be present when this dock development is complete.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. Gentleman is not tempted to go wide of the debate, which relates to the consent of the Secretary of State to certain works.

Mr. Bennett: The reason we want the consent of the Secretary of State is to have as near certainty as possible that if the reclamation is allowed to go ahead the docks will follow.

As the Bill stands, the reclamation will start on the basis that the company believes that, over three years, it is likely to go ahead with the dock development. I am trying to demonstrate to the House that, for all sorts of reasons, and whatever the company's good faith, that certainty cannot exist, because of the great doubt about the fixed link and the doubts over the attitude of other ports which may decide that is worth dropping their prices. Dover, which will see much of its work disappear, will try very hard to take on container work.

At the moment, approval will be given for the work to start, the reclamation will go ahead and land will be lost to the environment and the birds. In the end, the company may decide that it cannot go ahead with the proposal. We wish to ensure that the company will go ahead. When it wishes to start the reclamation it must make its case to the Secretary of State for the Environment. The Secretary of State must be satisfied that, within 12 months, the company would be ready to continue with the remainder of the construction. That appears to be an eminently reasonable proposal. If the promoters are attempting to resist this new clause, there must be some doubt in their minds as to whether they really want to go ahead with this development. There may be some doubt that, having undertaken the reclamation, they will place the port facilities and container berths on that site.

That brings us back to the other possibility — that once they have the land they will decide to use it for some other purpose. Along the whole of the east coast there is land which was reclaimed — in most cases in good faith — for dock development but which is sadly unused and is no longer a good natural environment for waders and other birds.

One of the other amendments in this group requires the approval of Ministers when changes are proposed to the channels along the estuary. At present, we have the odd situation of competing measures for the enclosure of the water in the estruary. A competing measure has been put forward by the promoters of the Bill to enlarge the docks at Harwich. I understand that the question of working out tidal flows in river estuaries is extremely complicated and complex. Although models can be made in water tanks it is difficult to predict what will happen to the natural environment. If a dock is constructed on the Harwich side of the river and the Felixstowe enclosure is taking place on the north side of the river, the interests of those two developments could be in some conflict.

Both the projects wish to spend the minimum on retaining the navigable channels which would allow ships to pass up as far as Ipswich. Each Bill implies that the changes it will carry out will not alter navigation but that the other Bill will. The Minister's approval should be sought to guarantee that the implications of any changes to navigational channels which may occur as a result of this Bill will not adversely affect the ships which go up the river to Ipswich.

Once one starts to change navigation channels, one affects much wider areas of the mudflats. If the entrance to the river is narrowed it may start a scouring effect and damage much larger areas of the mudflats than those attacked directly by the Bill. It would be reasonable to call in the good offices of Ministers to arbitrate on the claims of the dock companies as opposed to the requirments of other users of the river, both for recreational purposes and as an attractive area for birds and other animals.

We should support new clause 2, the other amendments which pave the way for that and the further amendment which deals with the estuarine matters. I can see no reason why the promoters should not accept the new clause. If they want to demonstrate their good faith and confidence that they can carry out the development, I can see no reason for them not to accept it. If they insist on trying to persuade us not to accept the new clause, I can only suggest that it is because they do not have the confidence, like so many of my hon. Friends, that there is a demand for extra port facilities along the east coast or anywhere in Britain, or, for that matter, anywhere within western Europe, and they are interested in the possibility of enclosing the land if the development goes only halfway and then returning with another Bill with a suggestion that the land should be used for other purposes. Therefore, I hope that the House will support new clause 2.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): First, may I say, in answer to the points of order raised by the hon. Members for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) and for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter), that I am informed that it is normal for one Minister to monitor the progress of a private Bill such as this, particularly when the Government have expressed their neutrality on the major issues of conservation and development. Therefore, there is nothing particularly untoward about my presence here tonight.

Mr. Leadbitter: The Minister is correct insofar as he has gone. It is not unusual for a Minister to monitor for another, but it is an unusual practice for the House of Commons to be deprived, not of monitoring, which is a matter between Ministers, but of the opportunity of challenging the Secretary of State for the Environment or the appropriate Minister on the firm undertakings given in 1982, as we have been. That is something that should concern the House. I apologise to the Minister because he is not answerable for that, but I hope that, as part of his monitoring function tonight, he will convey to his colleagues in the Department of the Environment that the House is disturbed about the matter.

Mr. Spicer: I shall convey the points that the hon. Gentleman has made in such a courteous and reasonable way. However, as I say, it is not abnormal for a Minister to monitor a private Bill such as this.

Amendment No. 10 would involve the deletion of clause 6(3) and would threaten the company's ability to undertake the works authorised elsewhere in the clause. Therefore, it could be construed as undermining the purpose of the Bill. It is the Government's view that, as the Bill has received its Second Reading and has now been approved in Committee, it would be perverse to wreck the Bill as the amendment could do.

Mr. Weetch: I am grateful to the Minister for monitoring the Bill and giving us the benefit of his advice, especially when he is heavily pressed on other matters. However, when I come to speak on new clause 2 and the amendments I have some environmental questions to ask, one of which is difficult. It is an environmental point involving the Nature Conservancy Council which is disputed by the company and I should like such questions answered. I know that the Minister is competent in his own sphere, but will he be able to give us information on such a point?

Mr. Spicer: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his flattering comments, but the Government are not the sponsor of the Bill——

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): The Minister should not be taken in by them.

Mr. Spicer: I have never been taken in, particularly by anything coming from the hon. Lady.

The sponsors of the Bill are responsible for guiding the Bill through and, indeed, for answering specific points. There are other opportunities to question Ministers about their responsibility for their Departments and policies. I think that that is the best answer that I can give to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: The Minister said that new clause 2 is a wrecking amendment. As I understand it, that is almost — I say "almost" — questioning the Chair's selection, because the Chair does not select wrecking amendments. I hope that the Minister will try to justify that comment or perhaps withdraw it.

8.15 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not regard the Minister's comments as a reflection on the Chair. He was making legitimate comments about the amendments that we are discussing.

Mr. Spicer: I would not want to question the Chair's selection, nor was I talking about new clause 2. I was talking about amendment No. 10.

However, on new clause 2 and amendment No. 11 I have to say that the effect of the Bill would be to give Parliament's permission, which is, after all, the highest authority in the land, to the plans for this development.

If Parliament gives its approval, the Government believe that a requirement for the further consent of the Secretary of State for the Environment is not only unnecessary but creates ad hoc control by the Secretary of State which we would not favour. A well-established procedure is involved here by which Parliament is giving detailed consent.

My point is fairly minor: that we believe that the Secretary of State should not further intervene in the process which Parliament has approved. That is the only comment that the Government have to make on these amendments and why we would not favour them.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): Let me take up the point with which the Minister left us because in a sense it is at the core of the thinking behind this group of amendments and the new clause. As I understood it, the Minister was basically arguing that new clause 2 was not applicable because if the Bill had gone through the necessary stages of Parliament, Parliament would have so decided and therefore it was not necessary for the Minister to be consulted.

In the debate yesterday it became clear that if the Bill becomes law, it will override the wider Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 as that appertains to sites of special scientific interest. Therefore, this Bill affects the overall judgment of the major Wildlife and Countryside Act of Britain. In that sense, an additional safeguard, which is only a time safeguard — essentially that is what new clause 2 and the subsequent amendments are about—is well justified.

New clause 2 relates to clause 7 which places a constraint on the types of operation and works which can be undertaken by the company.

Before I develop that point, let me return to the problem which seems to be causing a great deal of difficulty for some hon. Members and which is one of the reasons why we feel that new clause 2 is necessary. That involves the issue of the site of special scientific interest which will be affected, and, indeed, destroyed by the Bill. I do not think that any hon. Member would deny that. The only point of difference is that those who support the Bill say that the site will be destroyed, but it will be improved because 500,000 trees will be planted. It is worth making the point, crucial to new clause 2, that the site was declared to be of special scientific interest because of the estuary, the wetlands, and the bird population which, at certain critical times of the year, occupies those mudflats.

We do not really understand all the meanderings and wandering of birds. We cannot understand the migratory patterns of swallows or wintering birds. It is a finely tuned operation. It is quite clear that if we remove the wintering area of some of those birds, we threaten the species. It is as serious as that. I use the poignant example of Duich Moss. The reason why the EEC is threatening the British Government over Duich Moss is that, if that area, where about 8,000 to 10,000 white-fronted Greenland geese are present over the bad months, is excluded, it is quite likely that the whole species will disappear. I am not arguing that that will apply directly in this case, because it is not as critical as that. What we suggest in new clause 2 is a limitation of time which will allow the birds to continue wintering in certain respects.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I respect the hon. Gentleman's sincerity, as I hope he does mine. It is not fair to describe the alternative as the 500,000 trees. About 176 acres of arable land in the Trimley marshes will be converted to grazing marsh — that is, part wetlands. The hon. Gentleman should be aware that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has said:

"with suitable management, such as that practised by ourselves in Elmley in Kent and elsewhere, it would be possible to create a worthwhile reserve on these Trimley marshes that would probably attract birds in nationally significant numbers."

The hon. Gentleman and I have considered the RSPB's letter. The RSPB is specific that the development would create a reserve able to "attract birds in nationally significant numbers."

That is the important point.

Dr. Clark: I wish, in a sense, that the hon. Gentleman has not raised that point, for the simple reason that I had not intended to quote from the letter from the RSPB. Quite rightly and fairly, he quoted from the letter yesterday and today. What he said was absolutely correct. It is important to note that the RSPB—I know that the hon. Gentleman will check it—went on to say:

"We have considered this most carefully and have decided that we cannot restrict ourselves in this matter."

The RSPB said that it would "not withdraw its opposition and voluntarily enter into a 'compromise' over the future of an internationally important SSSI".

Additional land will be set aside. Hopefully, that will satisfy some, if not all, of the birds. However, we do not know that, I think that we all agree that it is a jump into the unknown. One can understand the RSPB, in a back-up or fallback position, writing in the way that is has about Trimley marshes. Let us not deceive ourselves. The RSPB still opposes the Bill. It has made that clear to me in a telephone message today, and by sending me a copy of the letter that the hon. Gentleman and I discussed earlier.

New clause 2 tries to restrict the time in which the operations of the company can be carried out. It has been drawn up carefully by my hon. Friends and me. We took as a model the now defunct Tees and Hartlepool Port Authority Bill which contained a similar clause. We believe that the clause is apposite to Parliament and is legally correct. The new clause would require the Secretary of State for Transport to give his consent for certain works involving reclamation. If the House permits the Bill to pass as reported from the Committee, we believe that it will allow the company to meddle in important matters of national and international policy. The key point is that the area is not only an SSSI. It is further designated as not only grade 1 status but supergrade status by being declared under EEC directive 79/409. That gives the area further status.

We believe that if a private company interferes in issues which are nationally and internationally important, it is wise for Parliament and for the Government to have as much restraint upon the company as possible. Therefore, when we deal with a site, such as an SSSI, and if it is to be disposed of, the final decision must remain with the Minister. That is what the new clause provides. We have given the matter considerable thought. We thought that perhaps the Minister should be the Secretary of State for the Environment, but we felt it was right that it should be the main Minister—the Secretary of State for Transport.

If hon. Members agree to the new clause — I wish that the promoters felt able to agree to it; it does not restrict them too much — it may prevent the death of literally thousands of birds if major reclamation works are started and not completed. One might justify that if the economic expansion and industrial operation had got under way, providing jobs and employment. There is no guarantee of that. The new clause would try to restrict the development work within a time constraint. That would be a sensible move.

The consequential amendments, Nos. 8 to 12, develop that further. We envisage the construction of a quay frontage along the lines intended by the company, but we would not allow the reclamation of the whole of Fagbury flats and the salt marshes immediately. In reality, we take a step-by-step approach. The amendments and the new clause require that. The company would have to justify every stage of development. We realise that the company has commercial interest to protect, and we acknowledge that, and we suggest that we concede powers to construct berthage, hard standing for cranes and the temporary storage of containers — in other words, the works and the facilities necessary for the ongoing construction.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) has suggested, the development could be constructed on an island site rotated at the outer limits of the bay. That would allow the gradual development of the site to take place with the minimum threat to the wildlife. It would exclude the company from reclaiming a substantial area of mudflats and salt marsh on the landward side of the quay.

We suggest the island site because that could be constructed in such a way as to maintain the tidal flow in a partly contained bay of Fagbury flats. The whole venture would be constructed to try to restrain as large a part of the mudflats system as possible, because that is the area that is regarded as the most valuable when it comes to the bird feeding area. We believe that that could be achieved quite easily.

We submit that neither the company nor the Committee, when it reported on the Bill—we accept all its good endeavours — made any serious attempt to consider a port development which tries to retain, as far as possible, the necessary wildlife interests in the area. By tabling new clause 2 and the amendments, we have attempted to combine, as much as possible, what may appear to be diverse activities and to build in a kind of linkage system so that each stage of the development would not take place until there was an absolute necessity for it. By so doing, we would have the maximum impact on the protection of the environment and the wildlife that lives on it. For those reasons, we have tabled new clause 2 and the amendments.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I hope that the House will follow the advice of my hon. Friend the Minister who spoke neutrally when he pointed out that new clause 2 would wreck the Bill. That is the intention of the Opposition and particularly of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch), who has never made any bones about it. I was surprised to hear him in one of his many interjections earlier suggesting that if this Bill were passed, in 20 years' time Ipswich would be a ghost port. That is the sort of exaggerated language that should have no serious place in such discussions.

8.30 pm

Ipswich is an important, well managed, municipal port and complements the ports of Felixstowe and Harwich. It is one of a complex of ports in those estuaries which service not only eastern England, but, increasingly, the whole of our trade. There is an efficient division of labour between the group of ports. The growth of Felixstowe assists the growth of Ipswich. One port benefits the other.

Dr. McDonald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I would prefer to give way to the hon. Member for Ipswich, but if the hon. Lady wishes to intervene, she may do so.

Dr. McDonald: I do not regard the hon. Gentleman's remarks as being entirely a private row between him and my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch). The hon. Gentleman talked about a general division of labour between the ports. I do not understand what he means by that. Tilbury, for example, is an extremely important container dock and will be adversely affected by the development of a large new container berth at Felixstowe. Therefore, I cannot see what the hon. Gentleman is talking about when he speaks of a division of labour between the ports.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: If the hon. Lady had listened a little more attentively, she would have realised that I was dealing with the prediction that Ipswich would become a ghost port. I was saying that that was a hopelessly exaggerated statement which had no place in a serious discussion such as this.

These amendments are primarily directed to the reclamation of land. It is important to keep the matter in some perspective. The shoreline of the River Orwell where the development is to take place is 22 miles long. The proposed extension of the port area is about half a mile of that shoreline, which is 2·5 per cent. of the entire area. Therefore, the development cannot be described as an environmental catastrophe, which was the language used by the hon. Member for Ipswich. Some 97·5 per cent. of the shoreline will remain completely untouched.

Obviously, I regret any intrusion into an area of outstanding natural beauty. Indeed, I had some part in establishing those areas. However, I must remind the House that of that 151 square miles of outstanding natural beauty in Suffolk, one third of one square mile will be covered by the port extension. I am advised that that is just under 0·25 of 1 per cent. That puts the matter into some perspective.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Has the hon. Gentleman considered the promotion of earlier Bills, in relation to the docks at Felixstowe? Does he accept that the argument is always that only a little piece of land will be taken, and that in the end all the extra pieces build up to the destruction of the whole environment?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I understand the piecemeal argument, but if the hon. Gentleman will study the Bill he will see that it provides a guarantee against the further movement of the port upriver. The promoters inserted that specifically to deal with the anxiety that he has raised.

I came across the problem of bird life when I sat on the Front Bench, taking the Maplin measure through the House. It was extraordinary how much time we spent on Brent geese. I am worried about the bird life, but it is to the credit of the promoters of the Bill that when the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds intervened, they immediately financed 75 per cent. of the cost of an extensive bird survey—the best that has been done in the area. The survey was carried out by the Suffolk Trust for Nature Conservation. I hope that the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) will accept that the trust is an entirely objective and deeply concerned body.

The report showed that the dock extension was in an area that was certainly important for three of the 30 species of birds to be found there. Therefore, we are talking about a small fraction of the bird population. Moreover, the count showed a considerable migration of birds in the Orwell and Stour rivers area. That has strengthened the view that development would displace a relatively small number of birds and would not disrupt the ecological balance of the estuary as a whole.

I must accept that any development such as this requires a balance. It would be absurd to suggest that there is no environmental impact, because obviously there is. However, one must balance that against the replacement of that lost proportion of land by alternatives. One of the alternatives, which I have already suggested in an intervention, is that a substantial area will be changed from arable land into grazing marsh. That will assist the bird life in the area. A great deal more assistance will be provided by flooding areas that are not now regularly flooded. The combination of the ...es, the grazing marsh and the prevention of further mo...ement up the estuary adds up to an enhancement of the total environment. Judged as a whole, there are gains and losses, but there is no environmental catastrophe of the sort forecast by the hon. Member for Ipswich.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the hon. Gentleman tell us which of the three bird species the Suffolk trust said would be most affected, and whether the replacement land would be of any use to those birds?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I hesitate tonight to quote from the report, but I shall be pleased to obtain that information for the hon. Gentleman, if he wishes to press me for it. I suggest that he writes to the Suffolk Trust for Nature Conservation.

Dr. David Clark: The hon. Gentleman has made a fair point that the ecology and environment of the area will be changed, and, rightly, talks about the flooded areas and marshes. However, it is not merely the ecology that could be changed, it is the ecology of those three bird species that is at risk. I think that they are the grey and ringed plover and the turnstone, which are rare birds. The marshes are of no particular use to them and are much more suited to Brent geese and other species. The key point is that we must consider not only the ecology of the area, but the existence of the three rare species of bird.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I respect the hon. Gentleman's concern in the matter and he will understand that my concern is no less than his. I remain of the view expressed by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, that with suitable management—all reserves need that these days—it would be possible to create a worthwhile reserve on Trimley marshes which would probably attract birds in nationally significant numbers. It is a matter of balance, but I do not believe that that balance was remotely accurately described by the hon. Member for Ipswich, when he described the proposal as an environmental catastrophe. That is an absurd exaggeration and he knows it.

New clause 2 would wreck the Bill because clause 6 is the essence of this development. Clause 6 confers powers on the docks company to construct the proposed works. Clause 14(1) provides that those powers may be exercisable for a period of 10 years from the passage of the Bill or for such extended period as the Secretary of State may allow.

The effect of new clause 2 would be to restrict the docks company's powers to construct the works by requiring the company to obtain the consent in writing of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State before the company can exercise any of the powers where land reclamation was involved. Since the entire development requires land reclamation, that would mean that the Secretary of State and his civil servants would have to give their consent to every item of contruction or development that was required.

The docks company may have every confidence in my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State taking a sensible and objective view of these matters. I am delighted to see the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food — my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer)—sitting on the Front Bench. He represents the area where these developments are to take place. It was only because my right hon. Friend has many duties to perform in Brussels — which he performs so well—that he was unable to present during our prolonged debate last night. However, I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would take a sensible view in that case.

Having listened to the language of Opposition Members and the interventions by the hon. Member for South Shields, I would not be surprised if a developer or customer of the port of Felixstowe, at home or abroad, believed that a Secretary of State of a Labour persuasion would take a biased and prejudiced view of the development of Felixstowe. The Opposition have demonstrated perfectly clearly—yesterday and today—that they would use the new clause to wreck the Bill if they were in office. That is a good reason why we should reject the new clause.

Amendments Nos. 6, 8, 9 and 10, with which new clause 2 is grouped, would produce an absurd position. If passed, they would reduce the area over which the new works could be constructed by removing any power to reclaim land. I am advised that that could be the effect of the amendments. Since the works cannot be constructed without reclaiming and that is an essential feature of the work, the result of carrying the amendments would be to make it impossible to proceed. The amendments are simply nonsense.

Amendment No. 11 would also require the docks company to obtain the consent of the Secretary of State before any work could be carried out — the same approach as that under new clause 2. In effect, that means that the company would be put into the leading strings of the Department of Transport. It would effectively make the company a branch of the Civil Service and tie it hand and foot to whatever view was prevailing on the items of contruction and reclamation involved in the work. The House would not sensibly wish to tie the hands of any private developer in that fashion. Worst of all, the amendment would effectively put the decision of the House into commission. Notwithstanding the view of the House — I remind the House of the overwhelming majority on Second Reading—

8.45 pm

Mr. Weetch: That was the payroll vote.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: If the hon. Member for Ipswich wishes to intervene, I will give way.

Mr. Weetch: One of the laughable things about this debate is the Government's "neutrality". It is the oddest form of neutrality that I have ever seen. Last night, the Opposition polled about 38 votes, but at least we made no attempt to make this a party political matter. The Bill has been pushed through by the payroll vote. This is a piece of Government legislation masquerading as private business.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman's comments illustrate the point that I have been making. Every hon. Member in this House is responsible for his vote to his constituents and to his conscience. It is a slur on the 140 hon. Members who voted last night for the hon. Member for Ipswich to describe them as he did. Only 38 Opposition Members could be bothered to support his shenanigans. It is rare for a private Bill to attract a vote of 201 to 54, as was achieved on this Bill's Second Reading. Since such a majority is unprecedented, the hon. Member for Ipswich should not have used such language to cast a slur on those who voted.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): As one of those hon. Members who took part in the Second Reading debate, may I remind the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) that apparently the reason for the 201 Conservatives voting the way they did was that one of their colleagues, speaking on behalf of the Bill, made the assessment that all that was in question were some utterly worthless mudflats. The 201 Conservative Members who supported the Bill were prepared to accept that description and prepared for Britain to ignore an important international commitment to which it should pay much more regard.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I do not doubt that the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) will develop that point if he has a chance to make a speech later. I was trying to deal with the issue raised by the hon. Member for Ipswich, who cast a slur on those who voted. We have been in this House long enough to see major decisions taken on the nationalisation and denationalisation of industries carried by tiny majorities. A majority of this size should not be treated as lightly as the hon. Member for Ipswich suggests.

The crucial point is this: the purpose of new clause 2 and the opposition which the hon. Member for Ipswich has mounted is to wreck the Bill, and to deny to East Anglia——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thought that we had established that the Chair does not select wrecking amendments. It is insulting for the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) to describe the selected amendment as a wrecking amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is not as sensitive in these matters as the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) suggests. No hon. Member has been critical of the Chair. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) is making a perfectly legitimate comment on the amendment, and he is in order.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I repeat the words that I used. I said that the purpose of the amendment is to wreck the Bill. That has been the aim of the hon. Member for Ipswich right from the start. He seeks to deny to East Anglia the opportunity of modernising its leading port. He seeks to deny to our industry and trade the opportunity, through a modernised port, to compete more effectively, not only for the North sea traffic but for the great world-girdling container lines. He seeks to deny us the opportunity to compete more effectively for that trade of the future.

The hon. Gentleman seeks to prevent the jobs being created in Felixstowe and in his own constituency of Ipswich. In so doing he flies in the face of the stated wishes of the Transport and General Workers Union. Brendan Lambe, the regional secretary, has said time and again that that union wishes the Bill to proceed. The hon. Gentleman seeks to deny to that union the jobs that its members wish.

Dr. McDonald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I shall not give way. I shall finish my speech.

The hon. Member for Ipswich further seeks to deny to that part of East Anglia the new investment that will enable us to improve our infrastructure. He is giving the lie to his party leader's frequent demand for more investment and more jobs. Here is more investment and here are more jobs. Here is a chance for us to be more competitive. I should have thought that a Labour party that brags about its desire to reduce employment and to create more jobs would have welcomed the Bill, instead of which the hon. Gentleman stands there seeking to wreck, to deprive, to deny and to destroy. He should be ashamed of himself. The House should reject the new clause.

Mr. Leadbitter: The House might show considerable interest in the manner, approach and vigour of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), who, in view of his constituency responsibilities in Bury St. Edmunds, does not appear to me to have any particular interest in ports. I have an interest in ports as a constituency Member, and I have had some experience of such legislation, so I believe that the House should be wondering at the excitement, the aggravation and the charges that the hon. Gentleman is making. I wonder whether it is connected with the relationship that may exist between the Felixstowe docks authority and the Conservative party. I do not know. I have heard suggestions that that company contributes large sums to Conservative party funds. Of course, I do not know. I am merely wondering why the hon. Gentleman is behaving in the way that he is.

Mr. Rhodes James rose——

Mr. Leadbitter: Another hon. Gentleman is rising. I understand that some of the land is owned by Trinity college, Cambridge. The hon. Gentleman is anxious to intervene, but I want to test the veracity of the words spoken by the Secretary of State. I want to put things in such a manner as to test the House, by asking a simple question. Where does truth really lie? Who is shifting whose feet? On the Opposition Benches, it is impossible for us to be charged in that respect, because this is not our Bill. We are merely reacting to submissions that have been made to us from communities in the area that is affected. We are reminding ourselves of the undertakings that the Secretary of State gave, to which I shall refer.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman says that he is representing the communities in question. I take it that he would suppose that the local authorities of the area in question would be representative. Suffolk county council does not oppose the Bill. Ipswich borough council does not oppose the Bill. Suffolk Coastal council does not oppose the Bill. Let the hon. Gentleman tell the House who those representatives of the local area are who oppose the Bill, because one thing is for sure — the hon. Member for Ipswich does not represent them at all.

Mr. Leadbitter: The hon. Member for Hartlepool who, for the hon. Gentleman's information, happens to be the person holding the Floor at the moment, never suggested that he represented the communities in Suffolk. I said that I had a port interest. It so happens to be the third largest port in the United Kingdom—the Tees and Hartlepool port authority. I was saying that I had had some experience of such legislation as is now before us. I emphasise that in point of fact the hon. Gentleman's attitude raised self-evident questions in the minds of reasonable hon. Members on both sides of the House. But I said that I did not know. I am told that there is a relationship. I am told that there is a funding relationship. I am told that that has not been rebutted. The hon. Gentleman is not in a position to rebut it, either.

The only point that I am making in a debate as serious as this is that where there is genuine opposition to the proposals, the House must be concerned. In addition, we still do not have a Minister from the Department of the Environment. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds apparently has no port interest in the sense that his whole time in the House of Commons is concerned with two things. The first is his proper responsibility as the Member of Parliament for Bury St. Edmunds. The second is that he is a paid officer representing the police.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am allowing the hon. Gentleman a fairly long preamble, but I am looking forward to his coming to the amendment.

Mr. Leadbitter: I apologise.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds said in his intervention that Suffolk county council was not an objector. It so happens that Suffolk county council, not unlike some other county councils, changed its mind when pressure was put on it. Originally, it objected, as far as I am aware. The proposals are in direct conflict with the county council's structure plan, which was approved by the Secretary of State for the Environment in August 1979. It is interesting that there has been that movement in the county council from a position that was agreed to by the Secretary of State.

I now come to a matter that fascinates me. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds described the position thus: the proposal involves only half a mile in a shoreline of 22 miles. Experience suggests to me that, once there is an incursion into land which has been designated for a particular purpose — in this case, in the words of the Secretary of State for the Environment — that is a precedent for further incursions. The nibbling process continues after that first weakness of changing one's mind about the designation.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds referred to the half mile out of the 22-mile shoreline to show the minimum impact of these proposals on the area, but he was not even correct in that respect. The Bill's sponsors sent out a memorandum which stated:

"The extension area is about one third of a square mile"

that is a bit of a difference—

"and comprises a relatively small south-eastern corner of a strip of roughly 150 square miles."

Notice the trick—only a square mile, which is a linear measure, compared with a square measure. The innocent who reads the document may think that not much land is really affected because it refers to a minimum amount of land, as shown by the linear measurement, along the coastline.

9 pm

The sponsors are not content with that. After all, they think that hon. Members are rather innocent. The memorandum continued:

"The extension area therefore is about 0·25 per cent. of the area of natural beauty and comprises about 90 acres of poor — that is, heavy clay — low lying, level, agricultural land separated by a clay wall from an area of roughly 140 acres comprising a small area of salt marsh and creeks and a larger area of mud flats which are only exposed at low tide."

That is all to tell us that we are making noises about an exceedingly small area and land of exceptionally poor quality.

On 29 July 1982 the Secretary of State for the Environment said:

"in general,"—

referring to this land—

"it would be inconsistent with the aims of designation to permit the siting of major industrial and commercial development in AONBs. Only proven natural interest and lack of alternative sites can justify any exception" — [Official Report, 29 July 1982; Vol. 28, c. 708.]

Why was there a change of heart within such a short period? I spent some days looking up evidence which might be helpful to the House, and to me, so that I might address myself fairly to the substance of clause 6. Part of my exercise involved considering the 23 sittings of the Committee. I noticed something strange but understandable. The Felixstowe port authority appeared to be bringing before the Committee witnesses who had a special relationship with it—they were either on friendly terms, were directly related to trading within the port or had shipping and other agency interests. One such person was Mr. George Patrick Gardiner who was sworn in on 5 December 1985. He agreed that he was "a director of a number of companies concerned with transport matters and transport facilities".

Further questioning brought out the fact that he had a much closer relationship with the company doing the main business in representing shipowners in the United Kingdom, sometimes but most specifically at Felixstowe. I was fascinated with that use of witnesses.

When Mr. Gardiner was cross-examined, Mr. Whybrow, representing the petitioners, said:

"You said last that it was essential for Felixstowe to continue to expand. Would you be prepared to accept the qualification to that expression of opinion, 'Unless suitable alternative facilities are available'?"

The witness replied:

"Yes. In the context of the national interest, of course".

He was further asked:

"And you have already agreed with Mr. Fatchett that there are potentials in other sites, Bath Side I think?"

The answer was:

"Yes."

That is a fascinating observation.

The Secretary of State for the Environment laid down two conditions. First, there was the national interest; secondly, there were alternative sites. Those were the two conditions that had to be met before there could be an alteration of the designation. The witness to whom I have referred is a man of considerable experience and authority. He appeared before the Committee purportedly to assist in upholding the proposals set out in the Bill, but under cross-examination from the petitioners he admitted that other sites were available for the development that the docks authority had in mind. Once that has been made abundantly clear, the House must draw back from the emotive expressions of concern that we have heard lately and ask itself where the truth really lies.

The Conservative Administration made certain things abundantly clear. They stated that there were only two exceptions that would prevent an intrusion. One was the national interest and the other was the lack of alternative sites.

What were the three main reasons for the Bill and the proposed works? It is rather surprising that only three proposals in principle and in purpose were outlined in Committee by Mr. Ryan, QC. He said that the first reason for needing the land and for having works on it was that of international trade. He claimed that the facility was required for major shipping lines in the container business. The second reason was the justified expectation of a substantial increase in trade. We did not have any figures——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, I am finding it difficult to relate the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the new clause and the amendments that are before the House. We are dealing with whether the consent of the Secretary of State should be required for certain works. We cannot go over the arguments that were advanced in Committee; nor can we have another Second Reading debate. The hon. Gentleman's remarks must be related to the new clause and the amendments that are grouped with it.

Mr. Leadbitter: I understand, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the difficulty in which the Chair finds itself. The first two lines of the new clause read:

"The Company shall not exercise the powers conferred by section 6"—

I must refer, therefore, to section 6—

"of this Act without first obtaining the consent in writing of the Secretary of State in any case".

The difference between section 6 and the wording of new clause 2 is that the section provides that the work outlined shall be allowed to proceed without the Secretary of State's permission. New clause 2 seeks to have the Secretary of State's permission attached to the same works. That being so, I must apologise to the House for finding it necessary from time to time to refer to the objectives and purposes that were outlined in Committee in the use of the designated area and the works that are outlined in section 6.

It was argued that the works should go ahead because of a justifiable expectation of a substantial increase in trade. I have seen no figures to support that expectation of trade. There are many imponderables, not the least of which is the Channel tunnel proposal. There are no projected statistics that make it clear that the designation of the land in question should be impinged upon in the interests of urgency or essential need.

The final reason that Mr. Ryan gave in his submission to the Committee was that the proposal was in the national interest. Therefore, this half mile of land, as it was described by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds, or two thirds of a mile of land, as it was described by the Felixstowe harbour authority, apparently has become of national importance and interest. How can that be when it is agreed that there are sites available on the east coast and on the south coast? How can that be when there are areas already designated for industrial development at Port Harwich? Where does the truth lie?

There is clearly on the Conservative Benches a commitment to support the Bill, because the Bill is there and because it has come from a Committee set up to consider opposed private Bills. Conservative Members are not saying clearly why they turn their backs on their own assurances to that area and to the people in it. The land was designated for a particular purpose and accorded that designation by the Secretary of State, yet they say that it does not matter. If it does not matter now, am I to understand that, when the Secretary of State made the designation in 1979 and his statement in 1982, it did not matter then?

How can responsibility accrue to the House of Commons if hon. Members are conveniently going to forget their responsibilities and obligations to a community after firm commitments have been given? How can we test the House of Commons if Conservative Members are shy and coy about declaring the extent of their party interest? If the undertaking that was given does not matter now, and the Bill is essential for a small piece of land in the national interest, then we have to say that the Minister and the Secretary of State did not mean what they said in 1982 and in 1979.

Here is a situation of power and influence overriding the parliamentary protection of the people whom we represent. That is what it is—overriding roughshod and horse trading. How many hon. Members when the Bill is passed will sit in the dining room congratulating each other on how Parliament was used in this way, with the Opposition virtually neutralised?

Mr. Rhodes James: Is the hon. Gentleman alleging—and he is a member of the Speaker's Panel of Chairmen—that I am corrupt?

Mr. Leadbitter: The hon. Gentleman has a remarkable record in the House of Commons of which, I am happy to say, he ought to be proud, and the House should not in any way impugn his character by words of the kind that he has used. That is not the intention. It was not he, but the Secretary of State, in the name of his party, who gave certain undertakings only a short while ago; and those undertakings have been breached.

Private Bills should be channelled through the House so that proper opposition can be expressed with the ability to challenge the exercise of responsibility of Ministers who are answerable to the nation. I submit that the House should have concern in this respect, and shall express a view as forcibly as I have. In my view, the House should consider the necessity to change its rules. Opposed private Bills in Committee cannot have——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot go into private Bill procedure on this amendment.

Mr. Leadbitter: I shall try to make the same point and keep in order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In the example that I have described to the House, the use of this land in a further incursion into the environment would have devastating effects on an area that has been agreed by the Government to be an area of natural beauty. It is a pity that we have not been able to defend the Secretary of State's first assertion because the procedures of the House do not allow us to do so. I have made the points that I wanted to make, and there rests my case.

9.15 pm

Mr. Hardy: I shall be brief because my voice would not allow me to emulate the passion that my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) has deployed.

I was very angry during part of the speech of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths). He misinformed the House. I hope that he will allow the record to be corrected. He told the House that Ipswich borough council was not opposing the Bill. What I think he meant to say was that the borough council did not petition against the Bill.

Mr. Rhodes James: That is what he said.

Mr. Hardy: No; he said that the borough council did not oppose the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) is a modest man. His local authority did not petition against the Bill because it knew that it need not waste ratepayers' money on the lavish fees that lawyers would have required. The council had every confidence that my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich would put the case against the Bill as well as a whole army of lawyers. Of course, the ratepayers of Ipswich have benefited greatly because my hon. Friend has demonstrated over the months that no one, whether or not a lawyer, could have opposed the Bill with greater consistency or ability. Even his political opponents must concede that my hon. Friend's efforts have been honourable and remarkably effective and competent.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman suggested that I had misinformed the House. If he had been here yesterday when we were dealing with the matter, he would have heard me say precisely that Ipswich borough council had not petitioned against the Bill. Tonight, in saying that none of the local authorities is opposing the Bill, I was using the word "opposing" in the technical sense in which we deal with these matters. It was open to the borough council of Ipswich to petition against the Bill. It elected not to do so. When the county council decided to withdraw all further opposition, the borough council of Ipswich could, if it had wished, have tried to introduce a petition. It decided not to do so. I was entirely correct in informing the House that none of the local authorities is opposing the Bill.

Mr. Hardy: The hon. Gentleman may indulge in semantics as much as he likes. The fact remains that the hon. Gentleman said that Ipswich borough council was not opposing the Bill. I presume that he wanted to create the impression that Ipswich borough council and my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich are on opposing sides of the argument. That is not the case. My hon. Friend's local authority is opposing the Bill but it has not wasted ratepayers' money, for which the ratepayers will in due course be grateful. My hon. Friend has performed a remarkably effective role.

Mr. Rhodes James: Is Ipswich borough council opposing the Bill?

Mr. Hardy: My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich, whom I am sure the hon. Gentleman will believe, as I do, has assured me that Ipswich borough council is opposing the Bill. My hon. Friend knows his borough council and his constituency far more intimately than anyone else. I accept my hon. Friend's word. I hope that no Conservative Member is casting doubt upon it. It is a pity that doubts were cast.

I could not take part in yesterday's debate. Hon. Members may have gathered that my voice does not have its normal mellifluous quality. Even so, it would have been impossible for me to be here yesterday. I have an interest in the subject. I should declare an interest because I am a member of the council of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. I am concerned that the views of the society should receive proper respect. I have not yet had an opportunity to read Hansard, but I have been informed that a Conservative Member suggested that the RSPB was somehow in favour of the Bill. I am glad that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds has made it clear that he did not offer such an imputation. I do not wish to pursue the matter at length, because I want to confine my remarks wholly to the amendment.

Dr. David Clark: As aspersions have been cast on the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, it is incumbent to put it on record that the society telephoned me today to say that it still opposes the Bill entirely.

Mr. Hardy: I am very glad to have that clear message from my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). It confirms the view that I had formed.

I have not devoted a vast amount of time to the Bill, because the arguments that were advanced on Second Reading were sufficiently powerful to convince Her Majesty's Government about the proper and responsible role and attitude that they should have adopted. I regret that the Government have been pressurised—no doubt by the regional interests—to take a view. That is quite wrong, and it is an example of very serious misjudgment. I shall turn in a moment to that statement and to the reason for the importance of the amendment.

The evidence presented on Second Reading justifies the amendment. It demonstrated that the port is unnecessary. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) pointed out, Britain has adequate port facilities. The Government are pursuing a dreadful and inaccurate obsession. Britain is a mercantile country. At one time it had a great merchant fleet. The General Council of British Shipping used to be the biggest financial contributor to the Conservative party, but it is so busy developing ports that it seems to be paying no attention to the fact that the British merchant fleet is disappearing——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying very wide of the new clause and the amendments.

Mr. Hardy: I shall not pursue that point. All I am trying to suggest is that the amendment would provide Ministers with an opportunity to reflect upon realities of this kind.

My major reason for involvement in this debate is that I am chairman of the Council of Europe's environment committee and that I have been acting as chairman and rapporteur on matters relating to the natural environment for a very long time. For the last few years I have been able to do so on a non-partisan basis. Conservative Members who serve on my committee have always agreed with the line that I have taken. That was certainly true in April of this year when I took the Committee through a report on the implementation of the Berne convention.

Throughout this period of five or six years, Conservative and Labour Members have sought on the Council of Europe—the leading international body on conservation matters—to try to ensure that Britain's leadership on conservation is maintained. I hope that the Department of Transport and the Department of the Environment will take note of the fact that, if we do not confer upon the Secretary of State the power that is contained in this amendment, our international position will be gravely embarrassed. Many other countries have copied the United Kingdom's example. If the other signatories of the Ramsar convention on wetlands see Britain going headlong into retreat in the face of the Ramsar commitment, they will do the same.

On Second Reading, Conservative Members said that this was an area of unimportant, valueless and uninteresting mudflats. Conservative Members appear to have learnt a little during the proceedings on the Bill, because of the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich. They now recognise that this is an area of both national and international importance. It would be remarkably injurious, not merely to the ecology of the Suffolk coast but to international integrity and to the example that our country should continue to set, for this project to go ahead. If the amendment is accepted, it should be borne in mind by Ministers that this port development was demonstrated by the RSPB study to be utterly unnecessary.

That is a particular cause of offence no doubt to those in Suffolk and certainly in the rest of this country, who are concerned that we should fulfil our international commitments. If we do not fulfil our international commitments to conservation, it will be little use hon. Members saying what should happen in other parts of the world. That is the nub of the argument, and as I have said, I do not want to speak for too long.

I urge Ministers to recognise that the voice of constituency interest should not necessarily be paramount. Ministers from the Suffolk region may feel that they can dictate Government policy but no wise Administration would ever set such a precedent. The views and advice of Ministers from that locality should be discounted as a matter of principle; that is particularly true when national and international interests are before us. If the Minister allows the national interest to be subordinated to the commercial interest that Conservative Members so ably serve, he will be acting in a very damaging way. One of the most important wetlands in western Europe will be destroyed or imperilled. Moreover, if he allows that to happen, it will greatly embarrass the significance of Britain's international conservation lobby.

Mr. Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): I had not intended to speak in this debate, but, having listened to the remarks of the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter), I felt that I had to comment. He asked where the truth lies. Well, it certainly does not lie in the distortions that we have heard from Opposition Members.

Mr. Leadbitter rose——

Mr. Thornton: I should like to finish my point. I listened to the hon. Gentleman's speech with some attention. But aspersions have been cast on me and other Conservative Members, if not by name by implication. If the truth lies anywhere, it lies in the 23 sittings that took place when only two of us, as the original members of that Committee, listened to every word of evidence put before us. I am prepared to be told that we are wrong, but I am not prepared to told that I was subjected to influences that in any way affected my judgment of the facts put before me. I bitterly resent some of the statements made tonight, last night and in Committee.

The hon. Member for Hartlepool talked about the neutralising of the opposition, but the opposition neutralised itself by refusing to serve on the Committee. The Committee had to have its quorum reduced to two in order for the Bill to proceed in the way that the House had determined. It is important to say these things. The onus on the promoters was to deal with the statement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in 1982. That was all that they had to do. I say that, but it was a major task, because they had to prove that an incursion was being made into an area of outstanding natural beauty and into a site of special scientific interest that was in the national interest, and that there were no suitable alternative sites. That is what they had to do, and we thought that that is what they achieved.

As I said, there were 23 sittings of the Committee. We heard witnesses on behalf of the promoters. If the hon. Member for Hartlepool is somehow suggesting that the promoters should not bring forward witnesses to testify to their case, I wonder what he feels they should bring witnesses forward to do. He, as an experienced Chairman, knows full well that the private Bill procedure is quasi-judicial and that the witnesses who come before us are on oath. Therefore, in the course of examination and cross-examination there are statements which conflict from time to time. However, extracting one statement here or there and having no regard to the vast weight of the evidence of the witness is the sort of distortion I was referring to.

9.30 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have allowed most hon. Members to have a fairly long preamble. The hon. Gentleman must now come to the amendments that we are discussing.

Mr. Leadbitter: I suggested to the House that there were two major conditions laid down by the Secretary of State. One was national interest and the other was the lack of alternative sites. My submission is that in the 23 sittings of the Committee the national interest was not made out and it was substantially proven that there were alternative sites. That was my point.

Mr. Thornton: That may well have been the hon. Gentleman's point. However, in seeking to make that point he introduced other factors. I am sure that he will understand why I took such grave exception to them. I reiterate all that I have said. I merely wanted to put it on record.

I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) that the new clause, which would destroy the Bill, does nothing to circumvent the Secretary of State's powers in this matter. It is for the House to decide having gone through the proper procedures.

I cannot see that the clause will do anything other than destroy a Bill which was given massive support on Second Reading, which has been the subject of lengthy deliberations in Committee and which is now properly on Report. In the interests of all that we have done so far, the new clause should be rejected.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): I seek to intervene for two reasons. I thought that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) cast a serious slur on my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch), on Opposition Members and many Labour councils up and down the country. I also feel it important to intervene because there seem to be fundamental planning implications in this legislation. I noticed, as no doubt you and the House did, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that we had a fleeting visit from the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment. Alas, it was too short because many Opposition Members are concerned about the environmental and planning implications of the Bill.

My first point relates to the remarks which the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds made about my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich and about the Labour party, represented in different parts of the country. He was, in effect, saying that the main reason why my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich, myself and others were opposed to the Bill was that we were opposed to industrial and commercial development. At least, that was my understanding of what he was saying. He then went on to suggest that the Labour party, or a future Labour Government, would do everything possible to prevent such development and therefore allow the persistence of unemployment in areas such as Felixstowe and other parts of the country.

That is pretty ripe coming from a Member of the Conservative party supporting a Government who have caused the present massive unemployment. It is even riper when one considers the magnificent record of the Ipswich borough council, the Greater London Enterprise Board, the West Midlands Enterprise Board, and my own borough council, to name just a few Labour authorities, which have played a major part, in spite of the Government's economic and employment policies, in bringing jobs to their areas.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has given his preamble. He must come to the new clause and amendments.

Mr. Barnett: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker; that was precisely what I proposed to do.

You may be aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that in the previous Labour Government I occupied the position in the Department of the Environment which is currently occupied by the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold). A number of planning decisions came my way on appeal. I am taking part in this debate because I am seriously concerned by the general principle that the planning power as laid down in the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 should be derogated and that the situation should arise whereby the Secretary of State for the Environment appears to have no say about the forms of development which may take place, anything up to 10 years after the Bill becomes law.

The amendment which has interested my hon. Friends and myself is amendment No. 11 which proposes to insert "and subject to the consent in writing of the Secretary of State for the Environment.".

That is absolutely vital. In clause 14 there is considerable derogation under the provisions of the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1977 which will allow a development to take place at any time over the next 10 years without any intervention from the Secretary of State for the Environment.

I began my preamble in the way that I did because decisions of this kind are inevitably extremely difficult. My hon. Friends and I are very concerned about the environmental development in and around Felixstowe and the effect that it would have on bird life. Those arguments have to be balanced against developmental arguments. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds clearly believes that these outweigh the environmental argument.

Sir Eldon Griffiths indicated dissent.

Mr. Barnett: The hon. Member shakes his head, but that was the purport of his speech, to which I listened with care.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I am quite sure that it is, as the Committee reported, in the national interest that this development should go forward. I am certain that any economic development has an impact on the environment. On Second Reading, I said that I could not support the Bill unless it contained an environmental enhancement as well as an economic development. The balance between the two is the result of the Committee's work and the negotiations between the promoters and the petitioners. We have achieved a balance that enhances the environment and also achieves the substantial economic expansion of the port.

Mr. Barnett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I do not know how he knows such things. How does he know what will happen in the future? Let us take a parallel case which is of great concern in my area of London.

Under the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 the Government introduced legislation—late in the Committee stage—to make possible the development of enterprise zones. This measure was passed into law and the assumption behind it was that it would enable small businesses to develop with the minimum of interference.

One enterprise zone was set up on the Isle of Dogs. An enormous international combine has come along and wants to build a vast office complex on the Isle of Dogs —Canary wharf. I am told by the Secretary of State for the Environment that he has no power to intervene. That is why I am disturbed by attempts to derogate from powers contained in town and country planning legislation, thereby removing from the Secretary of State any power over future developments.

The hon. Gentleman has only to re-read clause 6 which gives the promoters enormous powers over the future development of the land in question. One of the consequences of one piece of development may be that it would have a serious impact upon the bird life there. My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) is an expert on bird life and knows a great deal about the way in which they react to environmental changes. But how do we know how migrating birds will be affected and whether they will cease to come to Britain or perhaps die as a consequence of any development that may take place?

That kind of thing needs to be monitored, and that is why I am strongly in favour of amendment No. 11. That is vital in the Bill in order that the national interest should continue to be protected over a period of development or redevelopment, as is contained in clause 6, which may take place som years hence. The right way for such things to be considered is through the planning procedures that are now a vital part of the protection of Britain's environment. For that reason, I give my full support to this vital amendment.

Mr. Weetch: I wish to say a few brief words in support of new clause 2, but I really want to address some remarks across the range of the first group of amendments. Let me cut through a great deal of what I wanted to say because it has already been said and at this late stage in the debate it is better for me to come to the brass tacks of what new clause 2 is about. Its centrepiece is contained in subsection (2)(a), (b) and (c).

At the beginning, my hon. Friends and I took close professional advice on the new clause. In no sense was it put forward to wreck the Bill. We have taken a great deal of trouble over the amendments and they are as thoughtful as we could make them. My hon. Friends and I have not flooded the Order Paper with amendments, as we could have done. We have a small number of groups of amendments which we wanted to make as thoughtful as possible.

I shall not respond to all the flak that has come in my direction because I want to deal with the meat of the new clause which I thought, among other things, would help the environmental purposes of the Bill which, at the end of the day, is what we set out to do.

Sub-paragraph (2) says:

> "The Secretary of State shall give his consent under this Section in any case where he is reasonably satisfied that—
> (a) further development of the land which is to be reclaimed will be commenced not later than one year after the date on which the works of reclamation have been substantially completed".

That means that we want to keep within a reasonable time limit because there are many uncertainties in the growth of traffic and there are many complexities in considerations of this kind. We want to be sure that if land is reclaimed and developed it is needed. Once this wildlife facility is destroyed, it is destroyed for ever and paragraph (a) was put in to try to help the environmental cause of the Bill.

I should have thought that paragraph (b) could have been accepted by the promoters without any arguement. One of the conditions is outlined in paragraph (b) which states:

"no reasonable alternative site for that further development is available on other land within the area of jurisdiction of the Company".

In other words, the company should look carefully before damaging the wildlife irrevocably. It should see whether any other land is available. That is a simple proposition. I should have thought that it was a valuable part of the new clause. Paragraph (c) reads:

"the area of land to be reclaimed is no greater than that which is reasonably required to accommodate that further development"

That point sprung directly from the Committee's evidence that I read carefully. One of the principal things in dock economics that is becoming a marked feature of dock development all over the country is that with modern equipment, dock work requires a smaller space. If space is to be an integral part of dock economics, I should have thought that that part of the new clause would have appealed to the promoters.

Subsection (4) reads:

"A consent given under this Section shall come into force as soon as it is given and shall remain in force for a period of one year for for such longer period as may be specified by the Secretary of State when he gives his consent".

In other words, we are talking about a reasonable time scale in the whole of the development. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) made the point—he made it much better than me—that we are saying, quite emphatically—we have taken a good deal of professional advice on the new clause; it is the principle of the group of amendments — that while the Bill provides authority and power to make work and to do certain things, it is by no means the end of the matter. We believe that any development that takes place should be thought about carefully and should be supervised on environmental grounds so that we can engage in the process of environmental damage limitation. Even though the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company has permission to do certain things, the amendments try to establish a framework of safeguards to say that it should do so in a certain way in order that the process can be monitored.

9.45 pm

For the life of me, I cannot see that that is a wrecking proposition. I have been accused of trying to wreck the Bill when, frankly, all I have tried to do is to avail myself of my constitutional rights to scrutinise what the company is doing. If at the end of the day I am accused of trying to wreck the whole measure, as far as I am aware, I have not spoken out of order. I have stuck to the point. I am trying to make the points that are directly relevant to to the amendments.

The new clause requires the consent of the Secretary of State before certain works can be undertaken. I hope that officers from the Department of the Environment are here in spirit if not in person. Perhaps the Department is rather like the Phantom of the Opera. I want to bring out a number of points on which I genuinely need guidance on environmental grounds. The new clause relates to clause 6 of the Bill which gives the company authority and power to make work under subsection (2), to which our new clause relates. It gives the company power to "reconstruct, renew, alter, replace or relay the work and may maintain the same as reconstructed, renewed, altered, replaced or relaid."

Clause 7 relates to the deposition of spoil material in connection with land reclamation. I shall not develop the point because it has already been dealt with.

The Secretary of State for Transport is required to give consent to certain works containing reclamation, but not all. In addition, the provision does not apply to works which are not works of land reclamation, landscaping works, peripheral reclamation or deposit materials of any kind, although we argue that some of the amendments will damage wildlife in the areas to be reclaimed.

The purpose of the new clause is to provide certain safeguards for wildlife in the interests of international and national conservation. Unless the reclamation takes place in closely monitored conditions, we shall lose some of these facilities for ever more. The new clause seeks to ensure that that should not happen needlessly.

The evidence states that the development will mean "legalised concrete". I have not come across that phrase before, but I could not find a better description in the evidence if I tried. Together with all the back-up and buildings which go with quay and related development, the Secretary of State must have powers of permission and control to see that any development is carried out in as thoughtful a way as possible. That is in accord with our other amendments, to which I shall speak shortly.

I refer the House to the evidence of Dr. Michael Edward Moser, the national estuarial officer for the British Trust for Ornithology, given on Wednesday 26 February. He was a most distinguished witness and one can quote from almost any part of the conservation evidence. Dr. Moser examined the significance of the Orwell estuary and, within the estuarial area, the significance of Fagbury flats as a feeding and roosting area for wader and wild fowl populations. All the information was scientifically gathered from a birds of estuaries inquiry based on monthly bird counts on fixed dates which has been continuing since 1969. I am advised that all such counts are made at high water and with great thoroughness and industry.

I would not emphasise the point but for the tone adopted by the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company and underlined by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths)—that, since only a small proportion of the estuary will be affected, it does not matter. The heart is only a small proportion of the body, so, purely on size and area, its critical function is completely underestimated. All the evidence given to the Committee showed that that small area was absolutely critical.

We are making our case in the light of the dismissive attitude to the new clause. It is necessary to have these procedural safeguards over the company's actions, although overall permission is given in clause 8 for the power of work to be exercised for reclamation.

Some points need to be cleared up and I shall ask some questions because I am genuinely seeking information on one or two matters. I am holding a letter from the Nature Conservancy Council which relates to the Orwell estuary and notification under section 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. The letter sets out the responsibilities to the developer. In paragraph 4 it states:

"You are required to give written notice to the Nature Conservancy Council (directed to the Assistant Regional Officer), of your intention to carry out any listed operation and you may not proceed with the work unless:

(a) the operation is carried out with the written consent of the Nature Conservancy Council;

(b) it is carried out in accordance with a management agreement under section 16 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 or section 15 of the Countryside Act 1968 or

(c) three months have expired since the Nature Conservancy Council received notice of your proposal to carry out the work".

I understand that that point is in dispute by the promoters of the Bill. If the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds would listen to me, I would like him to clarify that point. I am genuinely seeking information on these points.

The letter from the Nature Conservancy Council contains an appendix headed "Operations requiring prior consultation with the Nature Conservancy Council."

There must be certain forms of notification before development can take place. In that appendix, 13*(b)* states that there must be notification of

"Modification of the structure of watercourses, [e.g. rivers and drains], including their banks and beds, as by realignment, regrading and dredging."

Appendix 17 refers to reclamation of land from "the sea, estuary or marsh."

As I understand matters from the original letter, the developer is required to give written notice to the Nature Conservancy Council. I understand from the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds that that point is disputed by the company. If that is so, I would like to know whether the promoters can tell me whether that is right.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) has stressed the international importance of the area. He was absolutely correct to do that. The crux of the points which the Opposition are trying to make about the procedures for the framework of protection, occur in amendment No. 11. Amendment No. 11 is very important. It states:

"Page 6, line 2 [Clause 6], after 'above', insert 'and subject to the consent in writing of the Secretary of State for the Environment.'"

Whatever alterations take place and when the company exercises its power to put works into operation, the Secretary of State on behalf of the environmental interest of the country should seek close monitoring of the position.

Amendment No. 11 requires the authority of the Secretary of State for the Environment for works which involve the enclosure and reclamation of the bed of the sea, the river and its foreshore. It is a normal provision of ports and harbour legislation for the authority of the Secretary of State for Transport to be required for such work.

Mr. Speaker: Second Reading, what day? No day named.

European Community (Drivers' Hours)

10.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I beg to move,

That the draft Drivers' Hours (Harmonisation with Community Rules) Regulations 1986, which were laid before this House on 11th June, be approved.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it will be convenient to take at the same time the following motions:

That the draft Drivers' Hours (Goods Vehicles) (Modifications) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 11th June, be approved.

That the draft Community Drivers' Hours and Recording Equipment (Exemptions and Supplementary Provisions) Regulations 1986, which were laid before this House on 11th June, be approved.

That the draft Community Drivers' Hours and Recording Equipment Regulations 1986, which were laid before this House on 27th June, be approved.

Mr. Bottomley: The regulations and the order form part of a comprehensive revision of rules governing the driving time and rest periods of goods and passenger vehicle drivers and the use of tachographs. Taken as a whole, the new European Community and domestic rules will benefit drivers by reducing the maximum number of driving hours in a fortnight from 92 to 90 and by increasing the requirement for normal weekly rest from 40 to 45 hours. There is provision for this to be reduced, but the reduction has to be compensated within a three-week period. The minimum break time for most drivers will be increased from half an hour to three quarters of an hour and it will be made easier for drivers to vary their driving hours so that they can reach their homes and relax properly rather than be forced to spend nights in their cabs.

The new rules pay attention to the needs of drivers and they are not too complex to enforce. The Government are firmly committed to effective enforcement of the existing and the new regulations. The new European Community regulations clarify and enhance enforcement officers' powers to inspect and seize charts. They place a new duty on operators to check that their drivers are observing the rules and to take action if they are not.

We shall continue our vigorous enforcement policy and will be consulting both sides of the industry about ways in which it can be made even more effective.

This subject has been under discussion in the European Community for four years. Most goods vehicles over 3·5 tonnes and most coaches are subject to the EC regulations on drivers' hours and tachographs unless they fall within a derogation.

New EC regulations 3820/85 and 3821/85 were agreed by the Council of Ministers on 14 November 1985 and will come into effect on 29 September 1986. Hon. Members will recall that in their draft form they were debated in the House on 3 December 1984. They apply directly to the United Kingdom and are not the subject of today's motion, apart from provisions for permissible derogations, but they underlie our debate.

The new EC regulations result from many months of negotiation and reflect the views of all the member states. We are not entirely satisfied with either the content or the drafting, but taken as a whole we believe that they are a significant improvement on the existing regulations and will bring benefits to both drivers and operators.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Minister confirm that the British Commissioner responsible for road traffic matters and transport matters has indicated that he does not support the regulations and sees no need for their introduction? Will he also confirm that there is no mandatory obligation on the British Government to introduce these regulations and, as a great many drivers see no need for them, will he respond to that feeling by not bringing forward the regulations?

Mr. Bottomley: The Commissioner is well able to speak for himself and give his own views. As for the second part of the question, I intend to cover it in what I have to say.

Drivers in this country are subject not only to the EC rules on driving time and rest periods but also to the provisions of the Transport Act 1968 on duty periods, the total time a driver may work. Drivers not subject to the EC rules are subject to the provisions in the Transport Act 1968 on driving, rest and duty periods. With the introduction of the new EC regulations, it was necessary to re-examine the 1968 Act.

Under the present EC regulations, the existence of two overlapping sets of laws complicates operational planning. Under the new regulations, this duplication would be largely unnecessary since the new provisions on rest periods will on their own effectively limit the hours a driver can be on duty. To retain our existing weekly duty limit of 60 hours would prevent the use of a new EC provision which allows weekly rest to be reduced in one week provided it is compensated within the following three weeks. So we are proposing to abolish all 1968 Act limits on duty hours in so far as they apply to driving subject to the EC rules.

Turning to the four instruments before us, the Community Drivers' Hours and Recording Equipment (Exemptions and Supplementary Provisions) Regulations 1986 will provide for permissible derogations from the two Community regulations; where the drivers' hours regulation gives member states an option to modify the application of that Regulation, take advantage of that option, and require the installation and use of tachographs in certain parcels vehicles.

Regulation 1 revokes existing regulations providing for exemption from the existing EC drivers' hours and tachograph regulations. Regulation 2, with the schedule, provides for permissible exemptions from the drivers' hours regulation. In most cases the vehicles exempted correspond precisely to the categories of vehicles specified in article 13(1). The exemption limit for buses and coaches is increased from a maximum of 15 seats to 17 seats, both including the driver. This will be of particular benefit to private users of such vehicles. Hitherto we have taken the view that private driving was not subject to the EC regulations, but the new texts make it clear that they do apply to passenger transport. This is something we have asked the Commission to re-examine. In any case, our power of derogation will be used to ensure that, on journeys within the United Kingdom only vehicles with more than 17 seats will need to comply with the EC drivers' hours rules and to fit and use tachographs.

Part II of the schedule contains exemptions from the drivers' hours regulation under article 13(2) of that regulation. These exemptions require authorisation from the Commission. Application has been made for such authorisation and the regulation will not be made until it has been granted.

Regulation 3(1) extends to national non-regular passenger services the concession allowing the weekly rest period to be taken after 12 days of driving instead of six days. Regulations 3(2) and 3(3) provide that an alternative break provision can apply to regular national passenger services operating into or out of central London. For those services the three quarter hour break after four and a half hours of driving can be replaced by a half hour break after four hours of driving under certain circumstances. We are considering whether this might be extended to other cities.

Regulations 4(1) and 4(2) provide exemptions from the tachograph regulation for vehicles exempt from the drivers' hours regulation and also sea coal vehicles. The exemption provided by regulation 4(2) also requires authorisation from the Commission.

Regulation 5 applies the tachograph regulation to all vehicles carrying postal articles, other than letters, which would otherwise be exempt. "Letters" is defined by reference to the Post Office inland post scheme 1979.

In regard to the Community Drivers' Hours and Recording Equipment Regulations 1986, this draft instrument made under section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972 makes consequential textual changes to primary and secondary legislation to take account of the repeal and replacement of Council regulations 543/69 and 1463/70 by regulations 3820/85 and 3821/85.

I turn to the Drivers' Hours (Good Vehicles) (Modifications) Order 1986. This draft instrument is made under the powers in section 96(12) of the Transport Act 1968 to modify the domestic drivers' hours code for goods vehicles which are outside the scope of the EC regulations. Under regulation 2 all of the domestic drivers' hours code is disapplied except for the daily driving limit in section 96(1) and the daily duty limit in section 96(3)(a). The time structure provided by a limit on spreadover in 96(3)(b) is removed. In consequence of the disapplication of section 96(4) of the 1968 Act, which provided for a statutory period of rest between two successive days, the definition of "working day" is amended. Regulation 3 replaces the existing provisions which provide for further exemptions for light goods vehicles with new provisions which have been altered to take account of the fact that all the domestic drivers' hours code, except for the two provisions on daily driving and daily duty mentioned, are disapplied under regulation 2.

Finally, we have the Drivers' Hours (Harmonisation with Community Rules) Regulations 1986.

This draft instrument is made under sections 95(1) and (1A) of the 1968 Act. Regulation 2 provides that the domestic drivers' hours code shall not apply to Community regulated driving but that the periods of driving subject to Community rules count towards limits in the domestic drivers' hours code. Regulation 3 alters the definition of "working week" so that, consistent with the definition of the "week" in article 1 of the drivers' hours regulation, it runs from midnight Sunday/Monday. This change is needed to synchronise the operation of the domestic drivers' hours code with the new Community provisions. Traffic Commissioners will be able to vary the date of making this change to suit the needs of individual PSV operators.

Taken as a whole, besides the benefits that I spoke of at the beginning of my speech, the new EC and domestic rules will benefit coach operators by making possible some longer day trips using one instead of two drivers; by easing the time pressures on some scheduled journeys; and by applying the same rules to tours within Britain as to international tours. They will provide benefits for lorry operators by allowing more flexibility in arranging work schedules, by removing the existing limits on duty time and by exempting operators on small islands, including the Isle of Wight, if the vehicles do not leave the island. They will benefit farmers by exempting from most limits their vehicles when used to carry goods within 50 km of base. They will benefit small businesses by exempting from most limits vehicles up to 7½ tonnes carrying materials or equipment for use in the course of the driver's work within 50 km of base.

Finally——

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): The Minister used the word "Finally". I hate to think that he intends to present such a one-sided account of the regulations and then sit down. Does he intend to address the very real concerns, of which he must be aware, that have been put forward by the Transport and General Workers Union before he sits down?

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman was probably here at the beginning of my speech, when he heard about the benefits that the regulations will bring to drivers. I intend to finish my speech and then to listen to the debate and respond.

The proposals contained in these instruments pay proper regard to road safety and they are consistent with our policy of reducing unnecessary burdens on industry. Trade unions and employers will be able to negotiate together new patterns of work which will allow both drivers and operators to benefit fully from the increased flexibility that is now available to them. I commend the draft statutory instruments to the House.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): I listened with interest to the Minister's speech. I was amazed by the Minister's complacency when he moved these very important and significant recommendations. I sense that both sides of the House agree with that statement.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): Rubbish.

Mr. Stott: Occasionally remarks like "rubbish" are made from a sedentary position.

These are very technical regulations, and by their very nature they are somewhat desiccated, as was evident from the Minister's monosyllabic delivery when he read his brief. However, just because they are technical and detailed does not mean that they are unimportant. They are very important. Many of my hon. Friends wish to speak during this one and a half hour debate. Therefore, I shall endeavour to keep my remarks to a minimum, but I make no apology for spending some time upon a very important and technical matter.

Before these regulations were laid before the House, the 1968 regulations provided for up to 10 hours driving at the wheel, up to 11 hours on duty, including driving, up to 12½ hours spread over—that is, booking on and booking off — and at least a half hour break for rest and refreshment after 5½ hours on duty. There were at least 11 hours of consecutive duty.

Because the law for the majority was simple to understand and enforce, it led to an improvement in road safety standards. That is demonstrated by the fact that the United Kingdom has a higher road safety standard than any other member state in the European Community. I am not proud of that, because there are still far too many accidents, but at least we can take some comfort from it.

In November 1984, statements were made by the Government in both this House and the other place about their intention to revise United Kingdom legislation which imposed limitations on regulation 543/69 for national journeys. The contention was that the proposed changes would eliminate the need to continue the limitations. The new regulations have now been published, and the Minister has told us about them.

Contrary to what the Government said, the new regulations will fundamentally change the hours of work and the rest periods, providing for an extension of driving hours and of the working day, and allowing, overall, for shorter rest periods. If the Government go ahead with these regulations, the permutations that will be available after 29 September will, in my view, and that of many people, especially those who drive heavy lorries, be impracticable and unenforceable.

In these regulations, the EC has apparently endeavoured to create greater flexibility for road transport operations and greater simplicity of enforcement, while increasing road safety and improving the working conditions of drivers. Against that, we must carefully examine what the Minister has said. Most United Kingdom drivers and operators are subject to national rules, which apply to journeys within Great Britain in vehicles over 3·5 tonnes maximum authorised weight.

In the past, national rules have comprised EC regulations and certain provisions of the Transport Act 1968. The new Government proposals, which are contained in these draft regulations, attempt to abolish the duty limitation on driving and work. I shall give four examples. We are now talking about statistics and figures. The current daily driving day, under existing legislation, is eight hours, but the Government's proposals will mean nine hours. The current number of hours for continuous driving is four, and the Minister now proposes four and a half hours. Weekly rest now totals 40 hours, and the Minister proposes that the figure should increase to 45 hours. Daily rest currently amounts to 11 hours, and in that regard, the Minister seeks no change.

Let us look at the figures for the current hours. They may be extended twice in any one week to 10 hours. Member states may fix minimum breaks of 30 minutes after driving periods not exceeding four hours for national passenger carriage on regular services. The daily rest periods may be reduced to 36 consecutive hours if taken at the base of the vehicle or driver, or 24 hours if taken elsewhere. Each reduction may be compensated for, en bloc, before the end of the third week in question. I apologise for giving such detailed information, but it is necessary to understand these regulations.

The emphasis on driving time limitations and the absence of any duty limits in EEC 3820/85 and the proposed national rules demonstrate a complete misinterpretation of the origins of driver fatigue. It reflects the commonly held view that driving fatigue is merely a factor of the length of time spent behind the wheel. It may be convenient to legislate for limits on driving times, but there is no empirical evidence to support driving time limits on road safety grounds.

Evidence showing that time spent behind the wheel is not a major factor in fatigue accidents was reported by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory in 1984. In a survey of 2,000 motorway accidents, involving heavy goods vehicles and passenger service vehicles it was found that fatigue was responsible for 11 per cent. of them. But the more important statistic is that 62 per cent. of those drivers had their accidents within 100 miles of beginning their journeys.

This is quite inconsistent with the view that limitation in driving time alone will reduce accidents caused by fatigue.

Research suggests that fatigue accumulates from mental and physical work in general and from irregular working hours which disrupt sleeping patterns and bodily rhythms. Many scientific examples demonstrate that. Dr. Ivan Brown, the assistant director at MRC Applied Psychology Unit, Cambridge, argues:

"There is a potential serious road safety problem among commercial truck and bus operators, where chronic fatigue is largely the result of bad law, which constrains hours of driving but fails to control hours of work, resulting in widespread flouting of the EEC Regulations and the general loss and disruption of sleep among drivers."

There are other examples where scientists have found that it is not the time behind the wheel that counts, although that is important, but the working day and the accumulation of fatigue over that day. The chap clocks on and starts to load his vehicle, drives down the motorway for the maxiumum four and half hours under these proposals, then unloads his vehicle, loads it again and goes back to his depot.

The amount of time that the driver of the heavy goods vehicle is subjected to fatigue is not necessarily manifested in the time that he is behind the wheel. Fatigue is the combination of the time that he is behind the wheel and the time that he is at work. That is the significant point which the Minister has missed. What we must do is to put a duty limitation on the time of work, not on the time behind the wheel.

At some pain to my researchers and myself, I have worked out a couple of examples. As my basis, I used the regulations which the Minister has just annunciated from the Dispatch Box. Driver X takes nine hours rest period, which he is permitted to three times a week, from midnight until nine o'clock in the morning. He begins work at nine o'clock with loading and unloading work at the depot until 13.30 hours. He then drives to his destination, without a break, for four and a half hours. He will arrive there at 18.00 hours. At this point he has been on continuous consecutive duty for nine hours. He takes a break of 45 minutes and at 18.45 pm unloads and loads his vehicle for three hours until 21.45 pm. He then starts his four and a half hour drive back to the depot, arriving at 2.15 am.

The new regulations will allow him to work in this fashion until 15.00 hours on day two when he will have taken his daily rest periods. I have not made that example up. That is what will happen under the new regulations.

Let us take a further example: the abolition of the limit of 11 hours on daily duty. Driver Y takes his daily rest period between midnight and 9.00 hours and loads up at eleven o'clock He then drives to his destination without a break, arriving at 15.30 hours. After a 45 minute break he unloads and loads his vehicle commencing at 16.15 pm and continuing until 19.30 pm. He finishes his days work with a four and a half hour journey home and arrives at midnight. Driver Y would be operating legally within EC 3820/85 and he could repeat this 14½ hour work schedule for three consecutive days.

Over the past few weeks, I have painstakingly worked out what could result, in terms of a working schedule, if the regulations went through. The Minister may say that, in reality, that would not happen because the employer would not want his driver to do what I have described. I do not know about that. Let us say, for the sake of argument, that the employer is an enlightened employer, and he may not want his driver to do that. However, there are many thousands of what are euphemistically called "cowboy operators" in the public transport field who would. Moreover, it would be legal for them to do so. They could do what I have described, and it would be completely legal.

There is no argument between the Minister and myself — nor was there with his predecessor — about the importance of road safety. I have stood at the Dispatch Box continually since 1979 and have addressed myself to the issues of road safety. I will not be found wanting by anybody in my concern for road safety. I do not doubt the Minister's concern either. I think that he is going about it the wrong way. I do not believe that it is a political issue. It is a common sense issue. I wish that the Minister would reconsider what he proposes, withdraw the regulations and have another think about them. If he does not do so, in my view and in the view of many people, he will be taking a retrograde step.

Sir John Wells (Maidstone): My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport will be acutely aware of my personal anxiety about all matters of road safety. I shall not speak about the case in my constituency that is sub judice, except to say that I do not believe that drivers' hours contributed to that great tragedy. There have been other tragedies in my constituency over the past two years where drivers have conceivably dozed off for a second or two. There have been subsequent accidents with the loss of human life where the driver has not paid a heavy penalty, for reasons best known to the courts.

Many lorries from the continent go to the town of Maidstone and its neighbourhood. Maidstone anticipates the Channel tunnel in the foreseeable future, and it welcomes fruit lorries because they are its life-blood. Drivers work long hours. The fruit markets up and down the country keep hours rather like the House of Commons. The people of Maidstone see those drivers thundering through their town at every hour of the day and night.

The picture painted by the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) of the changed hours in the two examples he gave of driver X and driver Y filled me with horror and dismay. I was also perturbed that my hon. Friend brushed aside the question that the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) raised of the traffic commissioner of the EEC. Why did my hon. Friend say that the traffic commissioner could speak for himself? I do not see him in the civil servants' box. I do not see him at the Bar of the House. He cannot speak to the House for himself. As God's representative in the House, perhaps my hon. Friend will speak for God for a moment.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Financial Times of 5 July reported Mr. Stanley Clinton Davis as saying:

> "I would have been happier if the council could have accepted other aspects of the proposal, notably the equivalent of a full weekend's rest for drivers and a better system for the control and enforcement of these regulations."

That is clear enough, as are the EEC press releases. It is frivolous and lazy for the Minister to give such an answer.

Sir John Wells: I understand why the Minister did so, but perhaps in his reply he will come cleaner with the House. Many hon. Members wish to speak and I do not want to waste the time of the House, but I must emphasise the great anxiety in my area about lorry and coach safety. We should like a little better assurance than we have had.

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): I have a special constituency interest in these regulations. Barnsley is only one and half miles from the M1 and only a few miles from the M6, so we have major motorways running north, south, east and west nearby. Consequently, it is in a perfect position for the siting of road haulage firms. Therefore, in recent years a multiplicity of large and small companies have come to operate from our area.

The Transport and General Workers Union branch 9/17 in my constituency, speaking on behalf of lorry drivers—the branch covers all the commercial firms and has up to 100 drivers in Barnsley and surrounding areas —is seriously concerned about the proposed changes in drivers' hours and rest periods. The drivers are not against change, but the present rules governing drivers' duty periods have been in operation for about 18 years, mainly to the satisfaction of lorry drivers, coach drivers, the TGWU and all the related unions. I am informed that all the unions affected by the changes are strongly resisting them. They fear — the Government appear to have admitted this—that within the regulations a 14 hour day is feasible. They have not agreed any of these changes with the Government, and there has been no unanimity on the new regulations on any of the European Economic Community Committees.

The TGWU sent a letter to the Department of Transport on 13 March setting out its objections to the regulations. It met Ministers on 30 April, and again expressed its concern. In particular, it stated strongly that the greater flexibility incorporated in the new regulations and the proposals to amend the provisions of the Transport Act 1968 would make enforcement more difficult and lead to increased driver fatigue. It is so seriously upset at the proposed changes that it is now issuing warnings to its men that being fatigued kills. It is so concerned about the well-being and safety of its members that its message is, "Sleep in bed and not at the wheel. Longer hours will lead to greater tiredness, and accidents will be inevitable." The union knows that bad employers will exploit the flexibility of the regulations to the detriment of its members. It fears that the effect of the regulations will be more tired drivers, and tired drivers are a threat to themselves and to everyone on the roads, including pedestrians.

Lorry, truck and coach drivers throughout the whole EEC, backed by the International Transport Workers Federation, have also combined to warn about the increased risk of accidents on the roads through fatigue. The ITWF has warned the Common Market Commission and the Council of Ministers that it is possible that a permutation of the new regulations could allow managers to operate drivers on six consecutive days, driving 12·5 hours on three days and 14·5 hours on three days. Two drivers on a vehicle could be on duty for a continuous period of 22 hours with two breaks of 15 minutes, and drivers on international coach trips could be on duty for 12 consecutive days before taking a rest day.

Employers can, and the fear is that some will, exploit the weaknesses in the regulations. There are bad employers and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) said, cowboy operators in the commercial truck business. Therein lies the danger and the unions' fears.

The Government intend to rescind the current 60 hours on duty limitation, and regulation 3820/85 recinds the current weekly driving hours limitation. Therefore, the union argues, driving hours will increase from eight to nine hours daily for all drivers, and, by the introduction of the sixth day working, they could then be called upon to work four nine-hour spells and two 10-hour spells, resulting in 56 hours driving and working in one week. They may not be called upon to operate for 34 hours the next week but what dangers will that one over-tiring and exacting week cause?

That is why the union, in its message to its membership, clearly states that the medical research studies in recent years have shown that excessive hours of work and inadequate rest lead to greater driver fatigue and increase the accident rate. The studies show that fatigue is often the contibuting or main cause of accidents. However, the employers and the Government have not accepted that. Drivers' health, safety and welfare are paramount. As the union states,

"Unless we can effectively campaign and succeed in retaining United Kingdom provisions for national journeys these will become secondary as drivers fall by the wayside, younger drivers will replace them, this is the practice now happening within the Community who have no on-duty limitations and work up to 90 hours in a week."

The Barnsley branch of the Transport and General Workers Union—9/17 branch—drew my attention to this final message which they endorse from practical experience.

The union has painted a very worrying picture. According to the union:

"There appears to be no comprehension in the Department of Transport about the physical and mental demands on a driver or the effects of fatigue. Various studies of illness and injury have been made. These showed increased rates of hypertension, coronary heart disease amongst drivers plus a high rate of insomnia, headaches, fatigue, ulcers and other digestive disorders as well as musculature problems including pain in the lower back and neck. Difficult working conditions associated with the lack of adequate toilet and meal facilities, noise, traffic, vibration, all contribute to stress-related factors affecting drivers."

However, the Department of Transport and the regulations take no account of that.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mason: I am making my conclusions.

My constituents say that they would like to know how rescinding the 11 hour on-duty time can be justified with no practicable means of enforcing the taking of the accrued rest hours. The Barnsley union continues:

"The change to a new fortnightly limit on consecutive driving will be impossible to monitor and enforce, while the abolition of the five-hour 30 minute continuous duty limit and its replacement with a four-hour 30 minute limit on driving will mean many drivers will never qualify for any break. Drivers will work longer hours. The inability to enforce what remains of the law will allow cowboy operators a free rein. They will compel reputable operators to work at least to, if not beyond, what would be legal. Looser drivers' hours regulations, coupled with a reduced police inspection rate when the Health and Safety Executive take over responsibility for roadside checks on vehicles carrying hazardous loads, will result in a cowboy's charter."

My branch of the union has a great deal of responsibility for its membership and it is seriously concerned about the regulations. The Minister addressed the House with contempt this evening. I have never known a Minister bring forward regulations of such importance, of serious concern to many lorry, coach and truck drivers—I speak on behalf of my constituents—and make opening remarks that were an absolute disgrace. I hope that he will rectify the position when he replies. It is incumbent upon the Minister to answer the many queries that have been raised in all seriousness and I hope that he will be able to allay many of the fears that I have expressed.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): This is a matter of great importance and one that involves safety. I am sorry that the Opposition should seek to make strident party political points when we are dealing essentially with matters that go to the heart of our transport system. As one who does not depend upon a research assistant—as the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) did—but who has been involved in industry and seen much of the distribution system, I know that there is a major fallacy in the hon. Gentleman's arithmetic—[Interruption.] I appreciate that some hon. Members may not wish to hear the fallacy, but they should bear with me for a moment.

The hon. Gentleman miscalculated, because he did not take into account the fact that, in many cases, drivers do not load their vehicles. I have visited depots in and around York and met drivers who belong to the Transport and General Workers Union, about which the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) spoke, and I know that the vehicles are already loaded before the measured time commences. If the hon. Member for Wigan is serious about transport—I think that he is, for he is an honourable Member, whom I have faced across the Chamber for some years now—during the recess he should go into industry, where he will find support for the measures.

I shall not rely, as the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) did, on quoting the Socialist former mayor of Hackney as the source of all erudition in this matter. The Opposition Benches contain much more skill than that on which he could have called.

Let us go to the root of the matter and consider the safety aspects of transport. My hon. Friend the Minister must be due some praise, for an increase in the weekly rest period from 29 hours to a minimum of 45 hours must be of interest.

I would ask the House to consider the equivalent of pilots' licences for the heavy goods vehicle and passenger vehicle industries. In the airline business, the qualified pilot can work only for a given number of hours. He cannot come off a plane, of whatever dimension, and immediately fly a smaller plane or another type of plane. However, that does not apply in heavy goods or passenger transport. Drivers who should be entering periods of rest can pursue gainful employment as drivers of other coaches or even taxis, for there is no correlation on the tachograph between the two forms of transport. I raised this matter in the House yesterday, in the hope that my hon. Friend the Minister would consider it today. We must consider the provision of personal logbooks for drivers. Then we could see the number of hours worked in a week or a month, which must be in the interests of traffic safety and of the drivers. Their periods of rest must be genuine, and not times when they are in gainful employment driving coaches and lorries.

Tourism has not yet been mentioned this evening. If, as is suggested here, there will be an increase in longer day trips for coach operators, and the application of similar rules to British and non-British companies, it must be in the interests of the development of United Kingdom tourism, which is the fastest growth industry in Britain. That is another reason for recommending the regulations to the House.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I found it no easier to understand the regulations than the Minister did to explain them. As someone who comes fresh to the problem, I am bound to say that the submissions of the Transport and General Workers Union were much easier to understand and a good deal more convincing than some of the Minister's comments. I know that he has valued his membership of the TGWU, and I should have thought that he would have given rather more weight to its submissions on the issue.

The Minister's case seems to rest on the argument of flexibility, and the fact that the new regulations permit daily driving and rest periods to be varied to suit operational requirements. I accept that that can be of great benefit to an operator, or a firm working on a tight schedule to get a job done or a delivery made. I also understand the Minister's point that on occasions that can be of great benefit to the driver, too. It can enable him to drive that bit longer to get home and have a decent rest rather than having a nap in the cab.

However, surely the message from various parts of the House is that flexibility involves risks, and the regulations provide for an almost infinite number of variations of daily, weekly, fortnightly and monthly driving limits and rest entitlements. Against that background, drivers will have great difficulty in keeping track of their own situation and entitlements. Whatever the Minister says about enforcement, it will be extremely difficult for enforcement authorities to keep track of what is going on.

The regulations provide the opportunity for unscrupulous employers, or indeed unscrupulous drivers, to take advantage of them, and to arrange for drivers to work over-long hours and to miss much-needed rest periods and meal breaks, with very little chance of getting caught. Such a situation must inevitably put pressure on the reputable haulier, the firm that is anxious to maintain standards and concerned about road safety. Such firms may be placed at a competitive disadvantage as a result of the operations of less scrupulous firms, which take full advantage of the flexibility that the regulations offer. That could lead to a general decline in the standards of the road haulage industry.

Other hon. Members have said that the 1968 limits that are being removed by the regulations were clear, precise and easy to understand. Since 1968, undoubtedly the situation on our roads has changed. In some ways, it has changed for the better, and in some ways it has changed for the worse. We have more roads, and in some cases better roads. We have more motorways, but at the same time there has been a substantial increase in car ownership since 1968. Commercial vehicles are in many cases carrying much heavier loads than they were then, and they are operating at much faster speeds. All those factors have increased traffic congestion and have certainly increased pressure on commercial drivers. As a result, they have increased the risk of fatigue. It seems to many of us that this is hardly the time to risk aggravating that fatigue by enabling drivers to work longer hours.

I know that the Minister argued on 25 June that

"There is no clearly established connection between driving hours and fatigue." — [Official Report, 25 June 1986; Vol. 100, c. 242.]

That is an argument that many of us who drive either professionally or on an amateur basis will find hard to accept. Whether we argue about that or not, one point that we cannot argue about at all is one put to me by the Woolwich district officer of the Transport and General Workers Union. He told me that under circumstances of congestion and pressure, fatigue can kill. None of us can dispute that. The TGWU quotes a 1985 survey of drivers in international transport, which showed that over 7 per cent. of those drivers had been involved in an accident caused by falling asleep at the wheel. I do not think that any of us would argue with the finding of my local TGWU official that "Any legislation to encourage this trend would be criminal."

That is an indictment against the regulations.

I understand that after four years of negotiation in Brussels there is an inevitable temptation to take second best. The Minister has accepted that the regulations do not meet all the United Kingdom's objectives. When we are talking about vital issues of road safety, and thinking about the sheer size of the vehicles that are now on our roads I do not believe that we should accept the risks involved in accepting second best. I suggest that the Minister should take the regulations away and produce something that is a good deal more watertight and reassuring both to drivers and to the public.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I speak in the debate with a constituency interest in having one of the nation's motorways, the M4, running through part of my constituency. The motorway brought good communications to Swindon, and at the same time it brought with it the risks to users of that motorway. It is with that issue in mind that I speak tonight.

The issue of road safety has been brought home to hon. Members very clearly today with the anouncement of increased accident figures for motorways in the past year. Clearly, we must consider that question. I pay tribute to the generally high standards of professional drivers of buses, lorries and other forms of transport who use the major road arteries of this country. With few exceptions, they demonstrate a professionalism and expertise that is a credit to their profession and an essential feature of high road safety standards.

We are discussing the marginal or grey area where the regulations can be broken and bent. We must ask whether the regulations, whether they are old or new can be adequately enforced. I ask the Minister to tell the House, in closing the debate, how he equates greater road safety and security for all users of roads with an increase in the number of hours that a driver may drive on one day, whether it is from eight to nine hours, or indeed, on two days a week, for up to 10 hours. How is that conducive to greater road safety?

Secondly, how far would increasing the maximum number of hours driven in one stage from four to four and a half hours be conducive to road safety, when the break that follows that period is reduced from half an hour to a quarter of an hour? I am not sure what one can do in a quarter of an hour. I suspect that a driver can rush around to do the things that have to be done. Is that very much of a rest? I question the regulations on that basis.

The complexity of the regulations must be evident to all hon. Members. We have heard an explanation from both Front Benches. Most hon. Members would say that an administrator would need to concentrate hard to work out rosters with all the permutations and find out what can be done legally, let alone what they can get away with. I question the regulations on the basis of their complexity.

The advantage that has been put forward is in the flexibility of these regulations. I do not agree with that view. Flexibility, if it is positively and properly handled, can be beneficial. Then again, flexibility can lead to a labyrinth of complications that can be abused.

Finally, how can we be sure that these regulations, if they are passed by the House tonight, will be enforced properly? I would welcome perhaps a departure from his brief, and hope that the Minister will tackle the issue of road safety. Will the Minister say that we can expect to have an adequate level of enforcement of the regulations to ensure that they are not abused and that, as a result, the safety of other travellers on our roads is not put at risk?

I hope very much that my hon. Friend the Minister will take up the point put to him by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory) in relation to a personal logbook. That seems to offer a way forward in ensuring that individuals will go by the book, literally. I hope that my hon. Friend will reply positively and sympathetically. I know that it is in his heart to do so because he shares my concern for road safety. I hope that the Minister will tell the House how he sees these matters and these problems being dealt with in the future.

11.8 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Like right hon. and hon. Members on this side of the House, and I dare say some from the Government Benches, I have been approached by many drivers from my constituency. I wish that I could convey to the Minister the sense of outrage they feel about the introduction of these proposals. I must say that their sense of outrage would be greatly increased if they had been able to attend and listen to this debate.

An overwhelming case has been put by my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott), speaking from the Front Bench, and by my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason). Indeed, there has been only one speech from the Government Benches in favour of the regulations. A hon. Member thought that it was relevant to pour scorn on the traffic commissioner in Brussels, who holds the same view as we do about the measure. The performance of the Under-Secretary of State has been pitiful and derisory. If the regulations are passed because of that type of persuasion, it will be an insult to the House and will do great damage.

All those who have discussed this matter listened with derision to the explanation of the Under-Secretary of State of what the regulations do:

"There is no clearly established connection between driving hours and fatigue.—[Official Report 25 June 1986; Vol. 100, c. 242.]

What drivel! Apparently, that view is based on a proposition of the House of Lords Select Committee. I doubt that that Committee really believes that. It is especially comic that that statement was made at a time when the other place is complaining that it sits for too many hours and that it is suffering from fatigue. What ludicrous nonsense that is. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will listen carefully to hon. Members' comments. I am sure that he is passionately eager to assist with road safety and to introduce fresh measures to meet that aim. These regulations drive in the opposite direction. The hon. Gentleman should be ashamed to proceed with them. If he does so, some of the blood will be on the Government's head. I therefore urge the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the regulations and look at them afresh. That is what the House asks him to do.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): I am a Member sponsored by the Transport and General Workers Union and I am currently chairman of the 31-strong group in the House. Yesterday, following a question by me we drew the attention of the House to the remarks of the Under-Secretary of State for Transport—the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) — in a written reply to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry). The hon. Gentleman made the idiotic comment that there is little relationship between fatigue and the hours that a driver spends at the wheel. The Minister's response was a carefully premeditated written reply to a written question. It was not made off the cuff.

The Under-Secretary of State comes to his present occupation with a reputation for caring about road safety. He is supposed to be an outstanding performer. We all care about road safety. If the House really cares, it will throw out these regulations. Conservative Members who are listening patiently must share our conservation and concern. They should not hesitate in the name of the House of Commons to reflect people's anxieties. They must say that they will throw out these measures and join us in the Division Lobby in opposition to them.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bidwell: Not at the moment.

Reference has been made to no less a man than the transport commissioner. He happens to be a former Labour Member who represented Hackney, Central. His scepticism about the changes has been recorded. He thought that they were a backward step. The changes have been opposed also by other bodies within the EEC set-up. The measures have been introduced because they have been discussed for a long time.

The regulations are a backward step. Manipulation and confusion will result. Calculations will be changed—for example, the hours of required rest will be changed from one week to another and there will be confusion about whether the hours driven in one week are to be added to the number for the following week. There will be hopeless confusion about the operation of the regulations.

I am disappointed that the Secretary of State for Transport is not present. The right hon. Gentleman is a newcomer to transport matters and I have been involved with them for a long time. I think that I am the senior member of the Select Committee on Transport. Most of the Select Committee's members are currently in Canada studying that country's railway system as part of a study of railways generally.

Commercial road transport drivers keep open Britain's main economic artery and we must be concerned with what they think about the regulations and the views of the union which mainly concerns itself with these matters. Surely the views of the drivers and their union are of great consequence. The International Labour Office has addressed its mind to transport matters, working conditions and safety generally. It has always emphasised that great weight must be attached to the views of employers and trade union organisations, and that above all responsibility should rest with Governments. The Government are evading the fundamental responsibility of ensuring that our roads are made safe by freeing them of fatigued drivers.

Mr. Porter: It would be helpful to the House to know if the hon. Gentleman is delivering his arguments, to which I am listening with great interest, as a representative of his constituency or as a delegate of a trade union.

Mr. Bidwell: Next week I shall be speaking at a public meeting called by my union to draw attention to the grave disquiet among union members and which should exist among the public once they become aware of what the Government are doing in imperilling their position on the highways.

The hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory), who is no longer in his place, has said that he has evidence that some drivers support the regulations. It is significant that he did not produce any evidence to support that contention. There has been ample evidence presented to the House that all those involved in road transport are gravely disquieted by the regulations.

In formulating the regulations the views of the transport commissioner as well as those of the transport committee and the social and economic committee of the European Parliament have been ignored. The social and economic committee is the statutory body that the Council of Ministers is required to consult.

Flexibility for the benefit and use of employers is the proposition that is before us. That is all that has been achieved. Bad employers will be encouraged by the manipulation that is possible of the regulations. Long hours are a killer. They kill the driver at the wheel and those who load vehicles before they take to the highways. Excessive driving hours and working hours lead to fatigue and loss of concentration. The 1985 survey of international transport drivers showed that more than 7 per cent. of drivers had been involved in accidents due to falling asleep at the wheel.

These matters have been well ventilated, and so I shall conclude by alluding to the aims and considered judgment of the International Transport Workers Federation, to which my union, the Transport and General Workers Union, is affiliated. The aims are a proper limitation on working hours as well as driving hours both daily and weekly, which is what the regulations do not achieve. There should be adequate rest breaks for meals and daily rest; the right of drivers to spend their weekly rest periods with their families; weekly rest periods long enough to allow drivers to enjoy a normal life to the maximum extent possible and simple understandable regulations—which these certainly are not—so that one knows what the position is and so that the regulations can be enforced to prevent the cowboy operators taking away work and jobs. That is the aim of the decent drivers on our highways today who shoulder such a substantial burden of our economic welfare and our road safety combined.

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell), I am proud to be a member of the Transport and General Workers Union, which I have been for 34 years, and I am a responsible member of that union.

To the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter), I say that I will be speaking not only for lorry drivers and coach drivers in my constituency but for 100 per cent. of my constituents who are road users.

The regulations are quite appalling. The Transport and General Workers Union has made its views very clear to the Government, and has had a national campaign about the regulations. I found it appalling that the Minister, in addressing the House on these highly controversial regulations, gave an explanation that was less understandable than the explanatory memorandum contained in the regulations. There was not a mention of the enormous opposition that exists to the regulations. There has been a marked deterioration of working standards and conditions for drivers in this country that is dangerous not only to the drivers but to the public.

I wonder how the Minister will answer the figures put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott). What my hon. Friend outlined could and will happen under these regulations that the Minister has brought in under the sacred name of flexibility. This is not flexibility, but a marked deterioration in the conditions of work.

If I may turn to the public, as all my hon. Friends have said, a tired driver is a dangerous driver; that is inevitable, because he is tired. My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan put his finger on the point when he talked about hours of work rather than hours behind the wheel. The hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory), who has left the Chamber, said that not all drivers load their lorries, and of course that is true. If the Government were concerned about road safety, they would have framed the regulations to deal with the driver who loads his lorry as distinct from the driver who does not. Just a little bit of care could have dealt with that. The Government have shown no sign of consideration for road safety.

What we are discussing for an hour and a half late at night after private business, tucked away at the end of July, will kill and maim people in the country. I beg the Minister to think again about the regulations.

As I have said previously when we have discussed harmonisation with Europe, let us realise what we mean by this. It must be borne in mind that the climate in this country is different from that in Europe. It is all right to drive on a lovely July night, but it is a different matter to drive through fog and snow in the winter. There are conditions in this country that drivers in Italy, the south of France, Spain and Greece do not experience. Their hours of work and hours of darkness are different from ours. In Scotland in the winter months most hours are hours of darkness. On the continent the conditions are considerably better and the climate is better. I hope that the Minister will reconsider this and will make amends for the disgraceful way that he introduced these highly controversial regulations by telling the House that he will go back to Europe and will think again.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I declare my interest at the outset as a sponsored member of the Transport and General Workers Union. I confess also—other hon. Members may do likewise—that I did not know that we were in EEC road safety year. It is clear from what has been said in these deliberations and from the remarks of the EEC Transport Commissioner that the regulations will do nothing to promote road safety.

The officer responsible for commercial transport matters in the TGWU, Jack Ashwell, wrote a blistering six-page critique of the regulations to the Minister on 3 June of this year in which he stated:

"There appears to be a mental block within your Department as to the consequences on drivers' health, safety and welfare".

As I listened for 14 minutes to the Minister recite his departmental brief, I could appreciate why Mr. Ashwell took that view.

Reference has been made to some aspects of the Minister's written answer of 25 June to my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry). Other aspects of it were interesting. For example, the Minister said:

"The trade unions consider that our proposals will lead to longer working hours, increased driver fatigue and hence increased accidents. It is true that the flexible work patterns allowed by the new rules may make longer working hours possible for some drivers occasionally, but those whose main work is driving will still be subject to effective limits. There is no clearly established connection between driving hours and fatigue."

My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) completely demolished that argument. It is clear that these regulations will be a charter for the exploitation of many drivers, that they will assist the activities of the many unscrupulous cowboys who have a presence in the industry and that they will damage the promotion of road safety.

The Minister went even further in his reply of 25 June, for he said:

"We believe that our proposals are consistent with our policy of reducing unnecessary burdens on industry while having proper regard to road safety. It will be up to trade unions and employers to negotiate together new patterns of work that would allow both drivers and operators to benefit fully from the increased flexibility now available to them." —[Official Report, 25 June 1968; Vol. 100, c. 242.]

That shows that this is all about lifting burdens on industry. As we know, that is a euphemism for enabling exploitation to occur as some people make profits.

The letter from Mr. Ashwell added:

"The 1968 Act dramatically reduced the weekly on-duty hours from 72 to 60 hours. Yet with worse road conditions, greater traffic congestion, larger vehicles, higher speeds overall, all demanding physical and mental requirements on drivers, your Department sees fit to remove restrictions. There is no enhancement in either the driver's working environment or working conditions. In fact, longer hours lead to greater stress on drivers through increased fatigue. Your Department does not even pay lip service to occupational safety and health in road transport. Extending a driver's hours of work is contrary to existing medical evidence."

Hon. Members have voiced their fears about the regulations. The Minister's pitiful attempts to justify the new provisions showed that the regulations are completely unsatisfactory and should be withdrawn immediately.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I am sure all hon. Members wish to hear the Minister. May I point out that he hopes to catch my eye at 11.33 pm?

11.29 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I am not a member of the Transport and General Workers Union but I am the holder of a class 1 heavy goods vehicle driver's licence, so I have experience of driving goods vehicles, filling in logbooks and so on which some hon. Members have been talking about.

I also represent a constituency that includes 30 miles of the A1 trunk road that is not dual carriageway. My constituents will be worried about the prospect of drivers making their way home, perhaps at the end of their legal driving hours under the new flexible regulations. In such circumstances it is inevitable that people will be suffering from severe fatigue and there will be more accidents similar to those of the past.

We are all in favour of flexibility, but it must be compatible with safety. I want to draw the Minister's attention to paragraph 3(1) of part I of the schedule to the Community Drivers' Hours and Recording Equipment (Exemptions and Supplementary Provisions) Regulations, which says:

"Any vehicle which is being used by an agricultural, horticultural, forestry or fishery undertaking to carry goods within a 50 kilometre radius of the place where the vehicle is normally based, including local administrative areas the centres of which are situated within that radius."

The Minister should ponder for a moment on the flexibility that that will provide in the far north of Scotland which my right hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) was talking about. The Highland region of Scotland extends to 10,000 square miles. I understand from the derogation that I have just quoted that it will be possible for anyone transporting timber, fish or agricultural produce within the whole of that area to be completely exempt from the drivers' hours regulations and from the tachograph regulations. Can such flexibility be justified?

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I shall confine my remarks to the element of risk. The risk factor is mathematically calculable. There is a distinct risk that this ceiling could collapse. That is calculable. If any hon. Members think that is humorous, they should remember that the ceiling collapsed in another place, thankfully not on any of the Members and not causing severe damage. There is a risk that the seat on which the Minister now sits could collapse. That is calculable. There is an even greater risk that the seat which he represents in his constituency might be removed. That is certainly calculable.

There is even a risk that the Minister may give us straight answers to the questions that have been put to him and that he may choose a different tactic from that which he adopted on 19 May when, in answer to questions by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), he frivolously engaged in phrases about

"frogs, which eat with their eyes closed, . . . Burkina Faso, the land of the wise men" and said:

"We can say that Anne Boleyn had six fingers or that 18 per cent. of people share their baths."—[Official Report, 19 May 1986; Vol. 98, c. 10.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must address the motion that is before the House. His remarks must not get too wide.

Mr. Cook: I am pointing out the risk that we may get straightforward answers to straightforward questions rather than hearing the Minister engaging in party games in the treatment of the nation's serious affairs. These statutory instruments are being given scant attention. All but two hon. Members have spoken vehemently and articulately against them. I hope that the Minister will treat them with the seriousness they deserve.

We have heard about wagons of fruit in Kent and about the lower incidence of risk in certain methods of transport. I represent a constituency in Cleveland where frequently ethylene oxide, caustic chlorine, highly concentrated sulphuric acid and other volatile and hazardous commodities are conveyed around the area. By increasing the hours of driving and the element of risk, we add to the danger of transporting such commodities.

If the Minister is content to run the risk of having to stand before us and report a major road traffic accident, he will also run the risk of having a name attached to him.

11.35 pm

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I begin by dealing with the speech of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). Once I met an old friend of his and, although this is probably an apocryphal story, when I asked him what the right hon. Member was like in his youth, and why he was such a good writer and made his newspaper so popular, his answer was that the right hon. Member was good at vituperation when he had not concentrated on the detail. The right hon. Member's remarks about the speech that I made earlier this evening are ones which in the light of day when perhaps he is feeling less tired, he will wish to reconsider. I would not ask for an apology, but I think he treated the House and my speech with a degree less of respect than might have been expected.

I assumed at the beginning of the debate that hon. Members wanted to be taken through the regulations. As the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) said, they are complicated and technical, and they should not be made the subject of party politics. It is worth noting that not a single Opposition Member referred in detail to the regulations, or said which of them they regard as acceptable or unacceptable.

A number of serious points have been made on both sides of the House. I have had the opportunity to listen twice to Jack Ashwell, the national organiser of the Transport and General Workers Union. The union has some serious points to make and it performs a useful function in an industry that is difficult to organise. With better operators, with or without union representation, there is concern for the safety and welfare of the drivers. I pay tribute to the union—as I would, even if I were not, as the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) pointed out, a member of the union.

My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) referred to the personal logbooks of airline pilots. We shall consider that point. We remember the very grave doubts of the Transport and General Workers Union over the tachograph. For many years it was referred to as "the spy in the cab." I wonder whether the union or its members would favour a proposal that appeared to increase what could be interpreted as interference by the law in their lives.

My hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) and other hon. Members referred to the professionalism of heavy goods vehicle drivers. I emphasise the tributes that have been paid to them. Their standard of driving has improved. The safety of heavy goods vehicles has also been improved. The roads have also been getting better.

At the beginning of my speech I said that I thought that the new rules would benefit the drivers. Opposition Members and some of my hon. Friends have said that if drivers' hours are unduly extended, they will lead to greater fatigue and therefore to greater risk. That is self-evident. In my written reply I said that the link between drivers' hours and fatigue had not been clearly demonstrated, but that referred only to the narrow changes that we are discussing. I did not say that if people drive for hour after hour, or become involved in the kind of concoction that the hon. Member for Wigan described, there will not be a greater degree of risk.

Fatigue also affects those who are not the drivers of heavy goods vehicles. If hon. Members work through until about four o'clock in the morning, return to work at nine the same morning, work through until about eleven in the evening and after that, if it is a Thursday, drive for four or five hours back to their constituencies, I suspect that they are substantially more at risk of falling asleep at the wheel than are most heavy goods vehicle drivers.

If the maximum number of driving hours in a fortnight are reduced from 92 to 90, that is welcomed. If the requirement for normal weekly rest is increased from 40 to 45 hours, that is also welcomed. If the minimum break time for most drivers is increased from half an hour to three-quarters of an hour, that helps to deal with the point about 15 minutes which was also made in the debate. If it is made easier for drivers to vary their driving hours so that they can reach home and relax properly instead of being forced to sleep in their cabs, that, too, is welcomed.

I do not want to make too much of it, but it is fairly normal for a driver, because of congestion on the roads, to find that he has exceeded his hours, so he has to stop, find a telephone box and telephone his depot. Somebody has to drive a car to the vehicle and change places with the heavy goods vehicle driver. The new driver then takes the heavy goods vehicle back to the depot while the old driver takes the car back. That practice meets the letter of the law, but the flexibility provided by these regulations will reflect reality more, as long as there is compensation.

I was not surprised to see my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir J. Wells) in the Chamber, and I listened carefully to his speech. He referred to the possibility of international drivers, carrying fruit through his constituency, having accidents. He also made an appropriate but non-specific reference to a recent accident in Maidstone. By regulations affecting drivers' hours and by every means possible, I am determined to improve safety. That may mean enforcing the tests on heavy vehicles, where more could be done, or ensuring that there are more weight testing stations. Vehicles could then be checked for overloading, and for the number of drivers' hours.

In my speech, I mentioned a commitment to consult the drivers' unions and operators on how to make enforcement even more effective. I suspect that Britain's enforcement is the best in Europe, and that we take our rules much more seriously than some other countries. I hope to be able to work within the EC with both sides of the haulage industry. The best practices may then be spread, and we may be able to learn from others just as they can learn from us.

I actually welcomed some of the remarks of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent. He is always worth listening to, but other hon. Members made rather more specific points. I am glad that the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) is in the Chamber. The Health and Safety Executive must be the enforcement authority, because under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act, there can only be one enforcement authority. We came to the view that as most mistakes or criminal errors among those carrying dangerous goods occurred at the place of loading, or at the place that the vehicle was operating from, it was better to transfer sole enforcement to the Health and Safety Executive. I explained carefully to a symposium in Middlesbrough, which was run by the Cleveland police, that safety was not being diminished. We can concentrate all the reports, some of which may draw prohibition notices. The police have the power, in effect, to take a vehicle off the road and to ensure that the report goes through.

I seriously believe that the new arrangements will lead to better safety as long as people get the right message. I could send the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central a copy of the relevant press release, and he might then be able to join me in spreading what I hope is the right message. The hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) referred to his position as chairman of the Transport and General Workers Union group in Parliament. Two Opposition Members wrote to me quite separately from any representations made by that union. Most of the representations have come——

Wedholme Flow

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

11.55 pm

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I wish to raise before the House an issue of considerable significance to conservation generally which touches on the long-established interests of my constituents on the Wedholme Flow just off the Solway coastline, 10 miles west of Carlisle.

Wedholme Flow is one of the three largest sphagnum peat bogs in production in the United Kingdom. Through the years, the use of peat has changed. At the turn of the century peat from Wedholme was used to bind up the wounds of those wounded in the first world war. Indeed, in Scotland one thinks of Flanders moss as one of the best known sphagnum peat bogs. Then the peat was used as moss litter for bedding horses and, finally, peat has now been developed by the horticultural industry as a suitable medium for enriching the soil throughout the gardens of England.

Wedholme peat is rated as being the finest sphagnum peat produced in the United Kingdom, and, indeed, the wrapper on a bale of peat produced there states,

"internationally acclaimed Golden Moss Peat the world's finest Sphagnum Moss Peat".

The peat works are an integral part of the small community around Kirkbride and peat has been cut there for over two centuries. In the Enclosures Act 1816, an area of peat moss was allocated to named individuals actually residing at that time within the parish who became in effect the freehold owners. The principle of the award was a residential qualification. Every household was apportioned a strip approximately one chain wide and extending to an area of about three acres. A similar award was made to Newton Arlosh parish in 1814. These are, therefore, long-established rights worked over many years by the residents of Kirkbride and Newton Arlosh.

However, over the past few months a cloud has been hanging over the moss. The Nature Conservancy Council is endowed by Parliament with important functions which my constituents appreciate. In 1959, just over a third of Wedholme Flow was designated a site of special scientific interest. Some 270 hectares was so designated. Mr. D. A. Radcliffe, the chief scientist for the Nature Conservancy Council, in 1977 wrote in his book "A Nature Conservation Review" that Wedholme Flow, "forms a single extensive raised mire unit, but is severely modified and . . . only a very limited section of the mire system is now viable".

By "viable" Mr. Radcliffe means viable for conservation purposes, and he goes on to note that "the area of intact Sphagnum rich raised mire vegetation is now reduced by cutting and by recent fires to a section about 0·4 kilometres long by only 90-180 metres wide."

The maximum area, therefore, intact is only just short of 18 acres and yet some 667 acres have been included within the original site of special scientific interest. Now with its richer purse, the Nature Conservancy Council is having another bite at the cherry and it wants to include some 780 hectares or almost 2,000 acres, which is more than 100 times the size of the original unspoilt part.

The stint owners now face a greatly enlarged SSSI. In support of its notification, the council has published a great list of species alleged to be special on the moss, but my constituents' researches have revealed that only one species on the entire list is not a "bog standard" species. Indeed, nearly all the species are listed and drawn on a poster produced for children describing sphagnum bogs and produced by the British museum. As part of its extension of operations, the council proposes to raise the level of the water table which will make the bog unviable to work for peat cutting and will undermine the areas of grassland on the fringe which for some reason the council has decided to include, which have been grant aided for drainage purposes in the past. Indeed, it is ironic that the only species of any rarity on the moss, Sphagnum Molle, like a dry site and the Council's very efforts to alter the hydrology of the district could kill the only species that can be said to be in any way rare.

My constituents have consulted one of Britain's top experts on peat and he has confirmed that, whilst the existing SSSI is indeed special, there is no justification for extending it by more than 100 times. The Nature Conservancy believes, apparently, that in order to protect the existing SSSI it needs a huge buffer zone where it can control the activities which would — in its view — endanger the existence of the current site. However, my constituents' specialist has confirmed that the two areas are quite hydrologically separate and therefore there is no need for such a large buffer zone. Nor is there anything special on the proposed extension of the SSSI which would justify the designation as "special". The whole of the stint owners' area has been worked on for over two centuries, and there is no way that the original mire can be intact, and we come back with the basic question, what is so special about the site? Is this really a site of special scientific interest? Why have there been no scientific papers written on Wedholme Flow in the past? Why have students of flora and fauna not been flocking there?

Unless it is thought that the existing peat workings are injurious to conservation, it must be explained that this is not the case. Even on areas which have been worked, these are now returning to a sphagnum lawn — even near drained farmland.

At the core of this application is the council's assertion that it needs this massive amount of extra land to protect the existing site. What expert evidence has the council for this assertion? It wishes to raise the water table but has not produced a detailed hydrology report on what the proposals would mean for the water table, nor has the council provided a proper detailed scientific analysis of the bog. My constituents' expert has said that the two areas are hydrologically separate and one could not support the other. This is borne out by a Mr. D. A. Greg, who was commissioned by the NCC in 1975 to make a report on the various mosses in the area. In his report he states:

"On a large scale Wedholme Flow can be divided into three areas. The central band of peat workings spreads right across the bog from east to west leaving two sections of raised bog which are isolated from each other."

The council seems to be relying on this report and that of a busy young lady, Miss Jane Smart, who in November 1980 recommended that the SSSI boundary be extended. She visited four bogs between 1 August and 5 August 1980 before reaching this conclusion on Wedholme Flow — but even then she said:

"A full survey would need to be carried out to determine the precise limits of the area."

Where is the NCC's "full survey to determine the precise limits"? In lieu of that survey, is the council going for a catch-all 2,000-acre plot instead?

Having established that the flow is not special, how do my constituents challenge the NCC? The Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and the subsequent financial guidelines for management agreement make no provision for compensation for members of the public who defend their own and who protect their family's long-cherished property. My constituents have been advised that they must now seek professional advice, which will obviously cost them considerable sums of money. How do they best protect their own, when taking on the might of the Nature Conservancy Council, with its far greater financial purse?

The council has listed an impressive array of 28 operations likely to damage the special interest which completely erodes the basic fundamentals of ownership of the land. The stint owners have been advised that the only way that they can achieve proper compensation is if planning would have been forthcoming for their part of the bog. This has been no problem in the past, and the stint owners would naturally expect to sell part of their bog to the commercial company operating the peat working there. Very little land in acreage terms is involved, but it is a right that the stint owners have exercised for 200 years and a right that they wish to pass on to their children, grandchildren and great grandchildren. They will now be deprived of that right, because the county council will automatically reject any planning permission for commercial peat workings if the NCC expresses an interest in the land. In any event, if the council raises the water table, the place will be too wet for milling and selling of peat and all workings will become worthless. That could have severe employment repercussions for the area in the longer term.

A further scandalous part of the council's powers is its position as judge and jury. If the stint owners apply for planning permission for their area for commercial peat extraction, who does the county planning authority have to consult? None other than the Nature Conservancy Council. And will the council give its approval to further peat extraction if it means it having to fork out four, five or six times the amount of compensation than if planning permission was not forthcoming? Clearly the council has a vested interest to say no to further planning consent to extend its ambitions to acquire the land. The stint owners are caught in a classic Catch 22 situation—if they apply for planning consent, nothing can be more certain than that the council will be unable to find a reason for granting consent.

One other worrying feature of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 is that it introduces no independent body to assess whether those sites are of special scientific interest. Section 28(1) states:

"Where the Nature Conservancy Council are of the opinion that any area of land is of special interest by reason of any of its flora, fauna, or geological of physiographical features, it shall be the duty of the Council to notify that fact."

Why should the stint owners have to resort to judicial review to assess whether the council has properly assessed the site as being special in its entirety? Why is there no provision for independent consultants to give their opinion?

In this instance, the council has not begun to attempt to satisfy the scientific interests of the stint owners as to its proposals. More seriously, it has completely overlooked the terms of section 37 of the Countryside Act 1968, as amended. The section reads:

"In the exercise of their functions under this Act and the Act of 1949" and the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, it shall be the duty of every Minister, and of the Countryside Commission, the Nature Conservancy Council and local authorities,

"to have due regard to the needs of agriculture and forestry and to the economic and social interests of rural areas."

Can it be in the economic and social interests of rural areas to bring about a cessation of all peat workings to attempt to expropriate their land with as little compensation as possible? Is not the enclosure award of 1816 of equal historic and hence scientific interest? For two centuries now, peat from the flow has gone to heat the houses of the residents, to dress the wounds of the afflicted in the first world war and to bed Army horses. Now the produce of Wedholme flow is being spread, even on this very day, among the gardens of England, including my own, introducing conservation and beauty into the back streets of the depressed areas of England—I include my back garden in that description! Has the council really had,

"due regard to the needs of agriculture and forestry and the economic and social interests of rural areas" in its desire to control this land? Does it really need 100 times the special mire area, when it already has under its control a large number of mosses and bogs, including Glasson Moss, of more than 259 hectares, and Bowness common, of 802 hectares? Indeed, the Bowness common notification is very similar in terms to that of Wedholme flow.

I must say to my hon. Friend the Minister in conclusion that I consider this a form of back-door nationalisation. I see no need for the NCC to take over all that extra land when there is more variety of surface microtopography on the existing SSSI. This is too complicated an issue to go into in this short debate, and I hope that my hon. Friend will agree to a meeting between herself and representatives of the stint owners who are affected. I hope that when she replies she will agree that commercial workings of peat and conservation of bogs can go hand in hand, and I hope that she will conclude from the evidence I have given her tonight that an extended Wedholme Flow is not really all that special.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): My hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) has raised with considerable eloquence and forthrightness a number of important issues relating to the present system for selecting and notifying sites of special scientific interest and the impact of SSSI notification on the owners and occupiers of the land concerned. I shall try to deal with them as fully as possible in a way which I hope will demonstrate that the current arrangements are both necessary and appropriate.

As my hon. Friend has said, under section 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, the Nature Conservancy Council has a statutory duty to notify as an SSSI, land which is in its opinion of special interest by virtue of its flora, fauna or geological or physiographical features.

In the case of Wedholme Flow, in my hon. Friend's constituency, the site is an extensive lowland raised mire, which is the largest of a series of raised mires on the south Solway plain, as he describe. They now represent the largest and finest concentration of that particular type of habitat in Britain. Lowland raised mires have, since the 1800s, been subject to significant losses. I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that the total remaining area of the habitat in Britain, which now possesses relatively few major concentrations of such bogs, amounts to approximately 1,800 hectares, of which almost half is within the north Cumbria complex.

Wedholme Flow is thus one of the largest and best remaining examples of the lowland raised bog habitat in Britain. It also possesses great conservation interest, and that has been recognised through its notification as a site of special scientific interest.

My hon. Friend inquired at length about the basis of the decision. I am advised that the NCC in fact conducted a considerable amount of scientific research over a substantial period before deciding on the area of the site to be renotified. Since as long ago as 1959, the site has been under continuous study by the NCC and others and several scientific reports, including those to which my hon. Friend—referred have been produced. I have not had the opportunity to study all of them in detail, but I understand that they confirm the importance of Wedholme Flow in conservation terms, and I should point out that, although the area of the original SSSI is of slightly higher quality, the northern area—that is the part within the proposed extension of the SSSI—is richer in species and has substantial conservation interest.

In 1984 and 1985 the NCC carried out detailed scientific surveys of the site, which involved the careful identification and recording of data on the species of the area and investigations of the topography of the basin in which the site is located, the surface contours and peat depth. The outcome of that work has confirmed that the whole of the renotified site is a single and discrete hydrological unit rather than several separate units, as has been suggested by some others. The NCC's decision was a careful and informed one and was based on detailed scientific investigations. The NCC concluded that the extension of the area of the SSSI was necessary for two reasons.

First, the additional area is considered by the NCC to have sufficient intrinsic scientific interest to merit notification in its own right. The totality of the site is important. The section comprising the Newton Artosh peat awards includes the best intact raised bog surface, with original surface pattening, in England. It supports a complete range of raised bog vegetation from high hummock vegetation to aquatic pool vegetation. It also supports several rare plant species such as bog rosemary, several rare sphagnums and all three of the sundews.

Secondly, knowledge of peatland hydrology has increased significantly since the original notification of the site. Since the early 1980s, the NCC's understanding of peat hydrology has been radically changed as a result of its own researches and there has been a series of publications by British and European specialists. I have a list of these publications, which I will send to my hon. Friend if he considers that they would be helpful.

This body of informed scientific opinion now suggests that, if the existing conservation interest of the site is to be maintained, it is necessary to ensure that the whole of the basin in which Wedholme Flow is located, rather than just a proportion of it, needs to be conserved. Because the existing SSSI and the northern extension form one hydrological area, if the northern extension was not included, peat digging would continue and the quality of the whole mire would deteriorate. This would lead to the loss of peat deposits, peat wastage, the threat of oxidation, drying out of the surface, the loss of pattening and the loss of vegetation areas, and the part that forms an integral part of this basin and is thus important to the well-being of the site as a whole.

Having said all that, however, and in the light of my hon. Friend's constituents' specialist views, the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 procedure includes provision for interested persons to make representations or objections to the NCC concerning particular notifications. The NCC is statutorily required to consider such representations or objections in deciding whether a particular notification should be confirmed and could be challenged if it failed to do so.

I therefore suggest that if my hon. Friend believes that his evidence suggests that the NCC may have got it wrong in this case, he should pass this to the NCC as soon as possible so that its objection procedures can proceed, as set out in the Act.

The NCC is a responsible scientific body and I am satisfied that it will give careful and objective consideration to any objections or representations of this kind. I do not think that it would be appropriate for the Government to seek to intervene.

Now, as my hon. Friend knows, having notified the site, the NCC considers that the continued extraction of peat from Wedholme Flow would be incompatible with the maintenance of the conservation interest of the site and has therefore included peat extraction in the list of potentially damaging operations. That means that owners or occupiers who wish to extract peat from the site, on whatever scale, would need to go through the statutory notice procedures set out in section 28 of the Act. All this my hon. Friend has clearly understood and also clearly rather dislikes. However, this would enable the NCC to consider the impact of particular proposals and, if necessary, to explore the possibility of protecting the site through some form of voluntary agreement that could include provision for payment and compensation.

As to the effect of SSSI notification on those with ancient rights to cut peat, I understand that, in the case of those who currently exercise the right to take peat for domestic purposes it has been the NCC's normal practice to grant a time-limited consent for such operations for a period of two years.

It is during this two-year period that the NCC would try to reach agreement with the stint holders concerned about ways of conserving the special interest of the site. That could involve the payment of compensation in respect of the value of the peat not cut. Alternatively, the NCC might be prepared to offer to buy out the stint or even to direct the peat cutting to another area of the site where it could go ahead without serious damage to the conservation interest.

There are, however, a number of stint holders who do not currently exercise their rights and would thus be ineligible for compensation. It seems to me logical that compensation should not be payable in respect of rights which are currently not being exercised, the suspension of which would not result in any actual loss to the stint holders concerned.

The arrangements whereby the NCC has to be consulted on all planning applications affecting SSSIs are designed to ensure that, in deciding such applications, conservation factors are given due weight along with other relevant facts and arguments. This procedure provides an important safeguard for some of the most important areas of our national heritage. It is true that the NCC would not compensate the owner or occupier of an SSSI for not carrying out an operation for which planning permission had been reflected, possibly on NCC advice. I can see nothing objectionable in that.

Owners of other types of land who are refused planning permission do not, as a general rule, have any entitlement to compensation. It would, in my view, be inequitable to treat owners of SSSIs more favourably, and would indeed give them a positive incentive to put forward damaging proposals.

As for the general arrangements for notifying SSSIs, my hon. Friend has suggested that the cards are stacked against owners and occupiers of such land and that they should therefore be given a right of appeal against SSSI notification. I do not think that the current system is weighted against the interests of owners or occupiers or that the existing safeguards for such interests are inadequate. I shall briefly explain why.

The machinery in section 28 is essentially a delaying mechanism. Its purpose is to provide a period of temporary protection for a site — four months — to enable the NCC to discuss, and if possible agree, with the landowner or occupier, suitable arrangements for the long-term management of the land. Landowners may thus be constrained only for a maximum of four months by notification of their land as an SSSI. Unless during this period the land were to become subject to some other form of statutory constraint, the owner would thereafter be free to proceed with whatever operations he wished, subject of course to the necessary consent under planning legislation. Parliament therefore concluded that SSSI notification does not involve any ultimate loss of rights over land and decided that an appeals machinery was unnecessary. This remains the Government's view.

If voluntary agreement cannot be reached during the four-month protection period, the NCC could ask the Secretary of State to make a nature conservation order to extend the period of protection for up to 12 months. Alternatively, it could seek to acquire the land compulsorily by asking the Secretary of State to approve a compulsory purchase order. In the case of a proposed nature conservation order or a CPO, the landowners would have a statutory right to object to the proposals and to have their objections tested against the NCC's case at a public inquiry. Indeed, several nature conservation orders have been challenged in this way and one has been revoked. It seems that the existing arrangements contain sufficient safeguards for the rights of landowners.

The NCC has a duty under section 37 of the Countryside Act 1968 to consider the economic and social interests of rural areas, which my hon. Friend has mentioned. The NCC is very aware of this duty in carrying out its other and equally important duty to notify SSSIs. Its procedures are designed to ensure that these considerations are given due weight in decisions affecting individual sites. The NCC accordingly consults my own Department, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Forestry Commission and local and water authorities about all extensions to SSSIs, and would take careful account of any comments or observations from any of these committees.

Another important safeguard is that all renotification proposals have to be approved in advance by the appropriate NCC advisory committee. These committees, which are in effect the NCC's board of directors, are broadly based and include representatives of farming and landowning interests as well as scientists and academics. The composition of these committees ensures that the NCC's renotification proposals are subject to the scrutiny of a wide range of interests other than purely conservationalists. However, the fact that section 37 considerations have to be taken into account does not mean that they will always win, and there will inevitably be occasions when the interests of conservation should be given precedence over economic or social considerations.

I hope that it will be clear from this explanation of the background that the procedure for the notification of sites of special scientific interest and their protection are designed to facilitate and encourage discussion, negotiation and voluntary co-operation. They are intended to provide a period of protection for the land, a breathing space, during which the Nature Conservancy Council can explain to owners and occupiers the nature of the importance of a site in conservaion terms, and discuss with them suitable and mutually acceptable arrangements for the future management of the land.

I hope that I have managed to convince my hon. Friend that the arrangements set out in the 1981 Act strike a fair and reasonable balance between the legitimate interests of landowners and occupiers and the need to conserve the natural heritage. However, if he wishes to bring the stint holders to discuss this matter more fully with me, I would be more than happy to meet them at a mutually convenient time and place.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Land Rover

3. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the implications for the possibility of securing the early privatisation of Land Rover of its recent achievement of a £50 million contract to supply the Australian Army with military vehicles.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Morrison): We are delighted that Land Rover has won this contract. Plans for the company's future remain as outlined in my right hon. Friend's statement of 24 April.

Mr. Taylor: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Will he be so kind as to take this opportunity to congratulate Land Rover on the excellent order that it has secured? Does my hon. Friend agree that, under the excellent chairmanship of Mr. Graham Day, and after a period of consolidation—which might take a little time—there are prospects for privatisation by offer to British shareholders?

Mr. Morrison: I shall certainly pass on my hon. Friend's message of congratulation to Land Rover and also convey to Mr. Graham Day my hon. Friend's feelings about the future of the Rover group under his leadership. I listened carefully to what my hon. Friend said about future prospects. The present position remains as stated by my right hon. Friend earlier this year.

Mr. Stan Thorne: Will the Minister tell us the present position on Leyland Bus?

Mr. Morrison: The straight answer to that is no, I cannot. The matter is being considered by the Rover group and we have yet to receive a recommendation.

Mr. Greenway: If my hon. Friend wishes to look for success in private industry and the value that that could have for BL, he has only to look at the rowing boats on the Thames taking part in the parliamentary regatta today. Is he aware that although the ITN boat crashed hard into a bridge, it did not split and there was no damage to boat or occupants? The Knights of the Shires boat almost——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is very ingenious, but the question relates to British Leyland.

Mr. Greenway: On the principle of privatisation——

Mr. Speaker: No. I think that the hon. Gentleman has had a good try.

Mr. John Evans: Would it not be more intelligent to allow BL to get on with its work, to stop all this talk about privatisation and to allow the company to concentrate on being a very good British company doing wonders for the British work force and for British industry?

Mr. Morrison: Of course, the hon. Gentleman would take that point of view. He is aware that since Jaguar returned to the private sector it has done outstandingly well.

Mr. Marlow: While considering how best to secure investment in the British motor car industry, will my hon. Friend tell the House how convinced he is that General Motors will seek to invest money in the United Kingdom rather than in the rest of Europe?

Mr. Morrison: As my hon. Friend will appreciate, General Motors has a long history, going back 50 years, of significant investment in this country, and we are very grateful for that. I hope that it will continue to make its European investment based in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Smith: Following the Minister's response to my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne), will he say when a decision will be made about the future of Leyland Bus? If on an evaluation of the bids it is clear that it is in the public interest that Leyland Bus stays in the public sector, will the Minister confirm that the Government will keep that option open as they did in the case of Land Rover?

Mr. Morrison: I regret that I am unable to say precisely when the decisions will be taken. The right hon. and learned Gentleman will understand that there are complicated matters to be considered, and they should be considered properly. The form is that the board of the Rover group makes a recommendation to the Department and the Department considers the recommendation. I hope that the delay will be put to an end as soon as possible. I appreciate that that delay has had a debilitating effect on all those involved. The straightforward answer to the second point is yes. We shall look at the question in the context in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman put it.

Retail Furniture Industry

5. Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the operation of the voluntary code of practice of the retail furniture industry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): The furniture industry code is one of some 20 codes of practice in various sectors which are endorsed by the Director General of Fair Trading for the benefit of consumers. The Office of Fair

Trading is discussing with the National Association of Retail Furnishers, the trade association principally concerned, certain aspects of the code with a view to making it more effective.

Mr. Cockeram: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that the scheme, which has been of so much benefit to consumers, is in danger of having to be wound up because the cost has had to be borne entirely by the National Association of Retail Furnishers? Will my hon. and learned Friend use his charm and powers of persuasion to encourage the furniture and bedding manufacturers to honour their financial obligations to support the scheme, as was envisaged when it was originally set up?

Mr. Howard: The consumer also contributes to the cost of the scheme. I understand the concern that gives rise to my hon. Friend's question. I shall invite the Director General to consult the trade associations concerned to see whether an acceptable solution can be achieved.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Linked with the code of practice, is the hon. and learned Gentleman satisfied with the flammability test on materials used in the retail trade?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that recently I made an announcement about the flammability test, which I am satisfied will lead to substantially enhanced standards regarding the flammability of furniture.

Mr. Alan Williams: Bearing in mind that the greatest public concern is the safety issue and the risk of fire, and since that is essentially an element within the control of the manufacturers, will the hon. and learned Gentleman make it clear to the manufacturers, when he meets the trade associations, that all hon. Members expect them to make a proper contribution to the costs of the scheme?

Mr. Howard: As I said earlier, that is a matter for the Director General. I shall draw the attention of the Director General to the remarks that have been made.

New Businesses (Cleveland)

6. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many, and at what total value, grants have been made to existing and new businesses in Cleveland in each of the past 12 years.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): Over £470 million in regional assistance grants has been paid by this Department to businesses in Cleveland in the past 12 years. I have arranged for the figures for each scheme of assistance for each year to be published in the Official Report.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It seems to show that all Governments have put money into Cleveland, but Cleveland continues to have the highest unemployment. Does that not reflect on the Socialist sub-culture in that region, which denies so much to the entrepreneur who would go there and set up businesses?

Mr. Butcher: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his vigorous defence of the interests of Langbaurgh and the residents of Cleveland. That may have something to do with the fact that six Ministers, including two Secretaries of State, will have visited the region between 14 July and 5 August. Having made 15 visits myself over the past 48 hours to different organisations in the region, I can say that there is a clearer appreciation among all parties there that the enterprise spirit will be the basis for future jobs and that, in conjuction with the public sector, private enterprise can flourish.

Mr. Frank Cook: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on visiting Cleveland at long last this week, despite the fact that it has taken since before Christmas for him to do so. What were his impressions on industrial development there as a result of the knowledge he gained from his visit to the polytechnic's design department?

Mr. Butcher: As the hon. Gentleman knows, some controversy surrounds that department. Having visited it yesterday, I must say that I was impressed by the capability of the staff and students and by the determination of that department, in conjunction with the business studies section, to mount an exercise on behalf of local companies to ascertain whether they can source new products into the region. That seems to be at the heart of what we are all trying to achieve for Middlesbrough and for the Cleveland area generally. I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's representations on another matter. I have been in contact with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science—the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden)—about it.

Mr. Thurnham: Is my hon. Friend aware of the call by a former Member for Cleveland—my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan)—for a regional development agency to be set up in the north of England? Is he aware of the response to early-day motion 1030 in my name calling for such a regional development agency for the north-west?

Mr. Butcher: As my hon. Friend will know, whether we are talking of the north-west or of the north-east, that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to consider in terms of lead policy decisions at the Department of the Environment. We shall have to await the outcome of his considerations. For the time being, I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that it would not be wise to comment on a number of conjectural points made in recent days.

Mr. Alan Williams: Have any jobs or job opportunities arisen from this belated spate of visits by Ministers? Did any of those Ministers during their visits to the north reveal that the Government are relenting and are willing to return to the north the £180 million that they will steal from its regional funding over the next five-year period?

Mr. Butcher: That was a travesty of the true position. I repeat: to put £470 million into one economic sub-region the size of Cleveland is a very dramatic spend. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be a little more responsible in supporting the efforts of any party in any sector of the economy to ascertain how to achieve a better job creation rate for the money spent and to ascertain how that links with what the private sector would wish to do in partnership with public sector expenditure, for example on the rehabilitation of land. A number of the issues which we discussed, not just as part of an alleged "recent" attention to this area, were specifically targeted on the creation of jobs from three sources—inward investment, the birth of new businesses and the expansion of jobs among existing employers.

Following are the figures:

Westland Helicopters

7. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to the answer of 18 June, Official Report, column 1020, he will make a statement on the seminar chaired by the Minister for Information Technology on the morning of 24 January.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Paul Channon): The seminar to which my hon. Friend referred was one of a series involving the research and development directors of technology-based companies. It was attended also by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science and by representatives of financial institutions and of the Government.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the right hon. Gentleman recollect that 24 January was the morning when his predecessor consulted Sir Brian Hayes and other distinguished civil servants about Westland? What has happened to the doctrine of ministerial responsibility? What would Rab Butler, whose parliamentary private secretary the right hon. Gentleman was, have said about politicians who, when they get into a jam, start blaming civil servants for what they themselves have set in motion, authorising inquiries into so-called leaks knowing full well where the responsibility and initiative for the problem rested in the first place?

Mr. Channon: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman will expect me to comment on what he alleges in his question, which relates to a seminar chaired by my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology. It has nothing to do with the points that the hon. Gentleman has in mind. As the hon. Gentleman was kind enough to refer to Rab Butler, I assure him that Rab Butler always told me to answer the question on the Order Paper and not some fictitious one that came up later.

Mr. Dalyell: That is a good answer.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

8. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the current state of negotiations on the multi-fibre arrangement.

9. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the current state of negotiations on the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Butcher: The European Commission is conducting the negotiations on renewal of the MFA on behalf of the Community in accordance with the mandate approved by the Council of Ministers on 11 March. I am confident that a protocol of extension of the MFA will be negotiated by the end of July, when the present arrangement expires. In parallel, the Community has reached provisional agreement with a number of supplier countries on the renewal of bilateral agreements. My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade is keeping in close touch with the industry and other interested parties as the negotiations progress.

Mr. Lamond: Has the Minister been receiving the same sorts of letters as I have from concerned employers, who point out that the end of July is fast approaching, that there are well substantiated rumours that Britain continues to weaken our position with regard to the MFA, and that there is a threat to the fragile recovery of the textile industry and to the investment that has been going on and, as a consequence, to many hundreds, if not thousands, of jobs in the industry? If there is no truth in those rumours, will the Minister make that plain, and, if there is, will he do something about it before the end of July?

Mr. Butcher: I am pleased to have the opportunity to make it very plain to the hon. Gentleman that there is no weakening of our position. The current position on the mandate is the position that we wish to see delivered as being in the best interests of the United Kingdom industry. My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade and his officials, particularly the officials where daily contact is concerned, keep in constant touch with the position in the industry, particularly when we are monitoring things such as the sensitive products, where there is the greatest or changing threat. Therefore, I think that I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that, on almost a day-to-day basis, we are alive to the interests of our employers. Even allowing for the fact that, there is some limited further liberalisation of trading generally in those products, we feel that we have managed to produce a situation that recognises all the various interests.

Mr. Madden: Despite the fawning subservience of the Prime Minister to President Reagan and all things American—perhaps, indeed, because of it—is not the prospect that as America will have a much tougher regime against textile imports, British textile firms will face increased competition from imports diverted from America? What contingency plans do the Government have to deal with that challenge, or will the Government sit back as they have done over the past six years and see 500 textile workers' jobs a week disappear? What will the Government do really to help an industry that has done a great deal to help this country's economy?

Mr. Butcher: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that it would not serve British interests to air publicly our evaluation of the efficacy or otherwise, or the strengths and weaknesses, of the Americans' recently negotiated position in bilaterals. With regard to the American situation, if changing circumstances permit a reappraisal of the way in which we pursue our bilaterals under the general protocol, that is something that we shall have to bear in mind. My understanding is that recent American bilateral agreements have been complex. It has been difficult to generalise about their effects, but, taken overall, they should not, in our view, cause us to reconsider our position at this stage.

Mr. Bowen Wells: During the renegotiation of this seriously protectionist measure, which is against Government policy as I understand it, has my hon. Friend been able to make any progress in phasing out the MFA over the next three years, so that our industry may know that it is coming to an end and be able to make itself more efficient, in order to compete and expand in the real world rather than the protectionist world?

Mr. Butcher: There is no doubt that three or four years ago the British textile industry had a very hard pounding, but there is equally no doubt that it has decided to come out fighting. The situation is not as gloomy as some Opposition Members would have us believe. With regard to the overall question of protection, we have said that there must be a continuation of the MFA, but under new terms. We have particularly said that, in the case of countries that indulge in one-way trading practices, for example, it would not be wise for us unilaterally to disarm. I cannot go along completely with my hon. Friend in the purist approach. I understand the philosophical basis of his argument, and I take his point.

Mr. Spencer: Is my hon. Friend aware that in my constituency the trade was horrified to learn that the alliance wished to dismantle the MFA altogether? Is he aware that any such action would cost thousands of jobs in Leicester?

Mr. Butcher: I believe that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, curtailed the use of a waterborne metaphor by an hon. Member earlier, but I can only say that in my view the alliance is well and truly in the drink on this. No doubt in the north-west in particular a number of local and general election campaigns will be dominated by the thoughts of some alliance spokesmen in the House.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Despite the talk of protectionism, is the Minister aware that the MFA has been virtually the only protection for our textile industry in recent years and that the entire industry throughout the United Kingdom looks to the Government for ultimate support in preserving the arrangement so that the industry can fulfil its potential in terms of export orders.

Mr. Butcher: I believe that the textile industry is now a highly professional, well-managed industry and that the skills of the work force are being properly used. If current attitudes continue, I see no reason why those companies that have not done so should not begin to increase their market share. The MFA is not a crude form of protectionism. It must also recognise the interests of consumers who, it could be argued, in some sectors have been paying higher prices than necessary for certain textile goods. That is why, as I have said, MFA policy is a matter of balancing interests. We believe that we have got the balance about right.

Mr. Fatchett: The Minister will no doubt have received many representations and requests from the clothing industry for a strong multi-fibre arrangement. Will he ignore the Liberal call for a weak or non-existent MFA? Will he also tell the Liberals how many jobs would be lost in the clothing industry if the arrangement were abandoned? In the negotiations, will he take account of the recent increase in clothing imports?

Mr. Butcher: I take the hon. Gentleman's latter point on board. He is correct to point out that the industry is still a huge employer, with hundreds of thousands of employees. In my view, it is extremely dangerous to tinker with the future of those people, but it is for the alliance to decide whether it wishes to withdraw the policy that it has proposed.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware of the report by City Analysts de Zoete and Bevan? It states:

"There seems to be no evidence therefore that MFA distorts, helps or hinders the progress of UK clothing imports . . . If the reason for MFA is protection it seems to us to be doing a pretty poor job and is probably irrelevant".

Does the Minister not agree with that analysis?

Mr. Butcher: This is clearly a serious development and the public have a right to know what the sinister de Zoete and Bevan faction is doing within the Liberal party.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that the MFA is a considerable European success as a defensive mechanism against unfair competition and that there could be more avenues for co-operation to defend the European market against unfair competition, including Japanese motor cars?

Mr. Butcher: One of the themes of the MFA and the Community stance to it is that we should be more helpful to countries which are free and fair traders and less helpful to one-way traders. Similarly, we should try to skew whatever room to manoeuvre he have in liberalisation towards the poorer countries. I believe that that is a correctly balanced approach.

Mr. Gould: As these crucial negotiations from our point of view are entirely in EEC hands, what assurances can the Government give the House and the industry that there will be no further weakening in the EEC negotiating mandate, which already falls far short of what is required to protect jobs in this vital British industry? Will the hon. Gentleman repudiate clearly and directly not only the siren voices of the Liberals but those of Conservative Back Benchers, and make it clear that he is ready to take further steps to ensure that the negotiating mandate is not further weakened?

Mr. Butcher: I said earlier that the British position is four square behind the current structure of the mandate, and we see no reason to amend that from now on. That is the best signal that the House can send to the Commission and the Council of Ministers.

Discriminatory Discounts

10. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the subject of discriminatory discounts.

Mr. Howard: Since 1 January 1986 my right hon. Friend has received four representations on the subject of discriminatory discounts.

Mr. Bruce: Will the Minister accept that small businesses are not impressed by the lack of Government action or by the Binder Hamlyn report? If the Minister is not prepared to take legislative action to try to protect small businesses against discriminatory discounts, will he at least consider introducing a code of practice by which large businesses should operate when dealing with small businesses in this sector?

Mr. Howard: Both the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report in 1981 and the Office of Fair Trading report in 1985 came to the conclusion that the benefit of these discounts was passed on to the consumer. Both the House and the housewives of Newcastle-under-Lyme will note that the contribution of the Liberal party on this issue is to press for measures that will lead to higher prices of goods in the shops.

Mr. Pollock: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that one aspect of discriminatory discounts is the tax structure operated by the Japanese, which gives preference to American whisky over the superior Scottish product? Will he do all that he can to convey to his Japanese counterparts the real and increasing concern in the House about that blatant discrimination, and not shrink from taking any further robust steps that may be necessary in response?

Mr. Howard: I raised this matter when I was in Japan a few months ago, and my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade has raised it strongly with the Japanese.

Mr. Hardy: Are not the Minister, his colleagues, his Department and the Office of Fair Trading well aware both of the substantial scale and the inherently unfair nature of the discounts that apply in the retail trade? Has this not been the principal reason for the rapid change in that trade, and is it not the case that, although a substantial number of jobs may appear to be created when a supermarket is established, there are no net gains, as many small businesses go out of business or dramatically contract?

Mr. Howard: No, this is by no means the only factor responsible for these changes. A number of other factors are at work. The Government must have regard to the interests of the consumer, and as long as the consumer benefits, as these reports have found, from lower prices as a result of the discounts being passed on, any Government would have to pause and think long and hard before taking any measure that would work to the detriment of the consumer.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Is not the question from the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) yet another example of the Liberals trying to have it both ways? Does he not spend his time telling the House that Aberdeen is the most expensive city in Scotland and that prices there are intolerable, while at the same time asking the Government to take measures that will result in higher prices for housewives in Aberdeen?

Mr. Howard: I agree with every word that my hon. Friend has said. Every hon. Member is aware of the extent to which the Liberal party tries to face both ways on every conceivable issue in every constituency.

British Leyland

12. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what current talks are being held regarding the future of BL.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The chairman of the Rover group has stated publicly that he is exploring the possibilities for collaborative and other arrangements with other manufacturers.

Mr. Park: Are the Government involved in these talks, or likely to be so? If they are involved, what is the likely agenda?

Mr. Morrison: In general terms, the answer is that the Government are not involved in the talks except, as I indicated in reply to an earlier question, in relation to the sale of Leyland Bus, which will be coming up shortly, when obviously the Government will be involved with the Rover group and its recommendations.

Mr. Warren: Is it not a fact that we now have in the Rover range a super car of world class and that all hon. Members on both sides of the House should back it, as I am sure we will do? Will my hon. Friend take into account the fact that the Select Committee on Trade and Industry has recommended many times that BL, or Rover, or whatever its name is, is an entity of British enterprise that we must all support?

Mr. Morrison: I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend has said about the new Rover 800. It is a maginificent car and certainly a very nice car to travel in as a passenger. As to his remarks on the Select Committee's recommendation about the Rover group, the members of the Select Committee and I discussed the matter at length three weeks ago when I appeared before the Committee. We have varying points of view but I thought that it was an interesting and important discussion.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the Minister reject the proposition that Department of Trade and Industry officials are manoeuvring the bids for Leyland Bus in favour of Lairds? May I have an assurance that Department officials are not being pressed unduly by the chief executive of the Laird group?

Mr. Morrison: In answer to the second question, the hon. Gentleman can have that assurance. As to his first question, I hope that he has sufficient respect for my right hon. Friend and me to know that we make up our own minds.

Mr. Marlow: With regard to talks with the motor industry, can my hon. Friend say when he or a member of his Department last had talks with General Motors, and what those talks were about?

Mr. Morrison: As I have stated to the House, I met Mr. Stempel of General Motors some months ago. Since then, neither my right hon. Friend nor I have met General Motors.

Mr. Hoyle: In regard to Leyland Bus, can the Minister tell us whether the Leyland board has reached a decision and whether he or the Secretary of State will make a statement to the House before the recess?

Mr. Morrison: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was in the House earlier when I was responding to similar questions. It may be helpful to the hon. Gentleman to tell him that I said that we had received no recommendation from the Rover group about the sale of Leyland Bus. I and my right hon. Friend have always said that we will keep the House informed about relevant developments.

Mr. Wareing: As the Government often allege that they believe in trade union rights and workers being able to make an input into their industry, and as there was a meeting recently of the work force at which it was overwhelmingly against any idea of privatisation and in particular the sale of Leyland Bus, what credence can be given to the Government's oft-spoken words in favour of allowing workers to have their rights? What rights are the workers in British Leyland to have?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman may or may not be aware that I have met delegations from Leyland Bus and that I have visited factories in Lancashire and in Cumbria. The very points that the hon. Gentleman made have been put to me fairly and distinctly. Of course we listened to those points but we are in the business of selling the company if the right bid at the right price arises.

Mr. Roy Hughes: May I remind the Minister yet again of the wise words of Lord Stockton about selling off the family silver? Has the Minister made any assessment of the financial implications for the whole of the BL organisation because of the uncertainty about its future? Would it not be wise for the Government at this stage to decide to fight the next general election on their own record rather than attempting to buy the result by the sale of public assets and massive tax cuts stemming from those sales?

Mr. Morrison: I have no doubt at all that the next general election, so far as the Government are concerned, will be fought and won on the Government's record, part of which is a very successful privatisation policy.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: In the course of such talks as there may be, will my hon. Friend bear in mind that the best interests and the best future for the individual subsidiaries of the Rover group may be very different and may also lie over distinct time scales?

Mr. Morrison: Yes, of course I shall bear that in mind, and it is something that we shall always have at the front as opposed to at the back of our mind when we come to take the relevant decisions after recommendations have been received from the board.

Mr. John Smith: Does the Minister appreciate the deep worry and concern of the workers in Leyland Bus who have seen the orders decimated by the Government's transport policy and who now face the prospect, if the Laird group takes over, of a very small bus producer taking over Britain's largest bus producer? Does it make any sense to encourage the Laird group simply to acquire a market share? Is not the sensible thing to do to keep Leyland bus in the public sector and support it strongly, in readiness for the upturn in bus sales that will come in Britain and throughout the world?

Mr. Morrison: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is making, very forcefully, the very points that the shop stewards made to me when I visited Leyland. I am aware, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman is aware, that there is over-capacity in the bus market. I am also aware —and I think that the shop stewards agreed with me when we discussed it—that the potential in two, three or four years' time is there, because of the changing nature of the bus fleets.

EUREKA

13. Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many projects involving United Kingdom companies have now been approved under the EUREKA initiative.

Mr. Butcher: A total of 33 projects involving British firms have now been approved under the EUREKA initiative. Twenty-eight of these were among the 62 announced at the third EUREKA ministerial conference held in London on 30 June. The remaining five are projects announced at the second ministerial conference in Hanover on 6 November 1985.

Mr. Richard Page: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. It appears that the initiative to put a commercial face on research is working. First, what is the value of these projects to British companies? Secondly, what steps are being taken by my hon. Friend or by his Department to make sure that projects which would have gone ahead anyway are not being funded through the EUREKA scheme?

Mr. Butcher: The total value of the projects that were announced on 30 June was £1,400 million. The value of those projects which involve the United Kingdom is over £730 million. Many of the projects are in the definition phase. The exact British share is difficult to assess at present, but an average of 25 per cent. is likely. As for my hon. Friend's question about whether these projects would have been supported anyway, he will be aware that a significant number of them require no public sector funding. They are levered forward because the companies are attracted by the market-opening opportunities, or the collaborative venture opportunities, or the exchange of information opportunities, but, where companies approach the Government for support, the additionality criteria will, of course, meet my hon. Friend's question.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Will the Minister please explain that the Department is now committed to meeting the required levels of Government support for industry under ESPRIT and EUREKA, and that he is committed to maintaining national programmes at a very full level to enable us to participate in those programmes? At the same time, the support for innovation budget had been reduced. How much money is foreseen as being available for Government support for EUREKA, and where will it come from?

Mr. Butcher: The prime objective of EUREKA is not to lever forward public sector-funded initiatives. They are market-driven initiatives. The hon. Gentleman asks how much money will be made available. It is precisely because our support for innovation programme is demand-led on a case-by-case basis against viable projects that I cannot give him an answer to his question.

Estate Agents Act 1979

14. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received on the effectiveness of the consumer protection provisions in the Estate Agents Act 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I have received no such representations. The Act provides important safeguards for the consumer, but I shall continue to keep a close watch on the effectiveness of the Act and the Director General of Fair Trading will continue to exercise his powers to ban or warn estate agents where he considers this appropriate.

Mr. Spencer: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that there are some estage agents who are still practising after they have been convicted of offences of dishonesty and are subject to a suspended sentence of imprisonment? Will he consider introducing legislation to place a duty on a court to report any such conviction to the Director General of Fair Trading, in order to give greater protection to the public against these tricksters?

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am very grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for drawing this matter to my attention. The Act provides for a court to bring relevant convictions to the attention of the Director General at its discretion, but I shall certainly want to consider whether there is a case for amending the Act so as to place the courts under a statutory duty to inform the Director General of these matters.

Steel Industry

15. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the current state of the steel industry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I welcome the profits recently announced by the British Steel Corporation, together with signs of growing profitability in the private sector. The industry still faces major challenges, but the progress made in recent years is most encouraging.

Mr. Flannery: Can we assume that no closures are likely in the steel industry in the near future and that any major closures are simply not on the stocks at all?

Mr. Morrison: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman did not congratulate the British Steel Corporation on its outstanding success. The corporation will have to continue to run a competitive industry. How that arises will be a matter for the corporation, but its success to date has been outstanding. Jobs within the British Steel Corporation today are far more secure than they were six years ago.

Mr. Hickmet: Does my hon. Friend agree that the performance of the British Steel Corporation has been remarkable? The £76 million profit which has just been announced is the first bottom line profit since 1974-75. Output is now at 14 million tonnes, which is a significant increase. That is the first increase in output for four years. United Kingdom steel consumption has risen by 2 per cent., British Steel Corporation's exports have risen by 4 per cent. and the overall productivity of the corporation is now such that 1 tonne of liquid steel is produced with 6·3 man-hours as opposed to seven man-hours last year. When the Labour party was in office, the figure was 14 man hours. With the ending of state steel aids, is not the position of the British Steel Corporation the strongest that it has ever been in the lifetime of the Government?

Mr. Morrison: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said. I only wish that the Opposition could bring themselves to congratulate the management and unions in the British Steel Corporation.

Mr. James Hamilton: The Minister will no doubt be aware that no later than yesterday 310 men were made redundant at the Clydesdale Tubeworks in my constituency, and there could be further redundancies in those works. There is 22 per cent. unemployment in that area. Does the Minister agree that if the Government had used their muscle with the British Steel Corporation in relation to the extraction of gas these jobs could have been saved, as could many other jobs that have been lost? Will the Minister do something about this before there is a catastrophe?

Mr. Morrison: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the corporation took what was an unpleasant decision only after the most careful consideration. I also assure him, in relation to job security in the corporation and in the industry as a whole, that the industry and the corporation must be run on the most competitive basis, or orders, and more jobs, will be lost.

Mr. Michael Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that the excellent results that have just been announced are, we hope, the product of the difficult process of re-nationalisation following the overmanning and overproduction in the industry? Will he tell us what he thinks is happening in the Community, where it is fair to say that our European partners have been somewhat laggardly in following our example?

Mr. Morrison: I do not think that my hon. Friend is being entirely fair, as much rationalisation has been carried out throughout the European steel industry. As he is aware, further negotiation and discussion will take place in the autumn about aids and quotas. I assure my hon. Friend that I shall keep a close eye on that ball.

Mr. Crowther: Following the ending of state aids to steel throughout the European Community, what steps will the Minister take to ensure that the British steel industry, in the public and private sectors, does not continue in its present disadvantageous position, because of the indirect subsidies to steel in other European countries?

Mr. Morrison: As I said a moment ago, I agree entirely with what the hon. Gentleman is saying. All aid should be transparent and all steel-making capacity should be on an equal footing. I shall be doing everything that I can within the Council of Ministers to ensure that that is the case.

Mr. John Smith: Does the Minister understand that his talk about security of employment in the steel industry will have a hollow ring for the 310 workers to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Mr. Hamilton) referred, a substantial number of whom live in my constituency? The hon. Gentleman will recollect that it is only a matter of months since an even larger number of redundancies were announced in the context of a survival plan for Scottish Steel and Tubes division. Is it not now painfully clear that the failure to acquire orders in the North sea oil and gas fields arises to a large extent from the Government's decision not to proceed with the gas gathering pipeline system several years ago? If that were in place there would now be orders for our steel industry.

Mr. Morrison: I appreciate what the right hon. and learned Gentleman says about his constituents and those of the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Mr. Hamilton). The decision was not pleasant to make, but, as I have said, it was made after the most careful consideration. It is important to realise, as I am sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman appreciates, that unless the corporation is run efficiently it will lose more orders and, therefore, more jobs.

Mr. Bruce: Will the Minister acknowledge that if an oil price of under $9 a barrel is sustained that will have serious implications for further development of the North sea and for steel orders, and that the threatened loss of jobs will be about 10,000 in Scotland, roughly equivalent to what a gas gathering system might have provided? If the Minister is not prepared to come forward with an initiative in that area—we have already lost the Sleipner contract — will he recognise that his Department and the Department of Energy must, as a matter of urgency, find some way of sustaining development projects in the North sea?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman is apparently arguing for a cartel of oil prices, which may be rather more difficult to achieve than he thinks. The most important thing for steel is that we should have the most efficient company in the shape of BSC, which we have, and that will enable us to get markets, which will ensure jobs.

Manufacturing Industry (Investment Levels)

16. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends to meet the National Economic Development Council to discuss levels of investment in manufacturing industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I propose to attend the next meeting of the National Economic Development Council on 23 September. At this and subsequent meetings I expect matters relevant to improving the United Kingdom's industrial performance to be discussed.

Mr. Lofthouse: Is the Minister aware that job prospects in mining communities such as my own, which have been devastated by the savage pit closure programme, are now reaching crisis point? Is he further aware that there is an urgent need for further investment to supplement the investment of British Coal (Enterprise) Ltd. in those areas? What will he do about that, or is it simply the case that where there are few Conservative votes there will be no investment?

Mr. Channon: No, I do not accept that. I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy to his point about British Coal (Enterprise) Ltd., which has done a good job. However, the hon. Gentleman asked me about the levels of investment in manufacturing industry, I am sure he will be pleased to know that manufacturing investment is up 6 per cent. and that non-oil industrial investment has risen to a record level.

Mr. Loyden: Does the Minister agree that the policies being pursued by the Government have been nothing short of a disaster for industry and jobs? Is he aware that the planning officer of Liverpool has recently reported that by the end of the century, at the present rate of deindustrialisation and loss of jobs, not one person will be employed in that city? How will that fit on his agenda, and what remedies will he support at the NEDC meeting?

Mr. Channon: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman says about the prospects for the future, nor do I accept what he says about the past few years. Britain now has stable growth, low inflation, high manufacturing output, high productivity, high manufacturing investment and high manufacturing exports. [HON. MEMBERS: "High employment."]

Mr. Hickmet: Does my right hon. Friend agree that numerous countries have sent advisers to the United Kingdom to seek advice about how we have harnessed private investment through the privatisation programme? Will he remind the NEDC that the policy of renationalisation, threatened by the Labour party if it should get into power, whether it is called social ownership or not, will reduce the amount of private investment in industry, particularly in those industries that have been privatised?

Mr. Channon: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The Labour party's policy of state theft, which it calls by some other name, will indeed have that effect. I shall take what opportunities I can in the NEDC, and possibly elsewhere, to make that point.

Mr. Williams: When the Secretary of State boasts about his minute 6 per cent. increase in manufacturing investment, will he confirm that, even with that 6 per cent. increase, manufacturing investment is still virtually 20 per cent. below what it was when he came to office, still lower than at the time of the three-day week and only at the level of 1960? Is he aware that, as a result of the collapse of manufacturing investment under the Government and their failure to sustain the level of investment at the level that they inherited in 1979, we have lost £10·6 billion in manufacturing investment?

Mr. Channon: The right hon. Gentleman persistently refuses to recognise that, since the worst trough of the slump in 1981, output has risen by 11 per cent., investment has risen by 19 per cent. and productivity has increased 23 per cent. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) said, the economic policies that are being followed are being watched all round the world and many people are trying to emulate them.

Shipbuilding Industry

17. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about the current state of the shipbuilding industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of delegations and much correspondence about the shipbuilding industry in recent months.

Mr. Cook: The Minister will be well aware of anxiety about naval shipbuilding capacity in Britain, but is he aware that there are no major projects for merchant shipbuilding ahead for next year? What will the Government do about that lack of work? Are they content to see this once great maritime nation become bereft of any merchant shipbuilding capacity and dependent for its supplies of such vessels on countries overseas?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman will know that my right hon. Friend accepted the proposals that British Shipbuilders put to us for a reduction in capacity. My right hon. Friend said at the time that there will be sufficient capacity for the orders that we hope to get. I assure the hon. Gentleman that every effort is being made to secure such orders.

Mr. Holt: Does my hon. Friend agree that, although he has had representations from a wide range of people in the Cleveland area, especially about the closure of Smith's dock, it is a little difficult to explain to them how a shipbuilding yard in Tasmania is successfully tendering for the Isle of Wight ferry?

Mr. Morrison: I am well aware of the delegations that I have received, and my hon. Friend has been in touch ceaselessly about the future of Smith's dock. I appreciate the difficulties in which he and those who work there find themselves. Difficult decisions have to be made when one has over-capacity.

Mr. Clay: Is the Minister aware that, in May this year, Japanese shipyards received orders for 40 cargo ships foreign to Japan, representing 295,000 gross registered tonnes, which is 50,000 tonnes more than British Shipbuilders says will be required in a whole year for it to stop all the proposed closures and redundancies? If Japan can get that many overseas orders in one month, which was a bad month for them, how on earth is it that the Government cannot enable British Shipbuilders to get the same amount in one year?

Mr. Morrison: I can neither confirm nor deny the hon. Gentleman's figures about Japanese shipyards. He will appreciate — he has been to see me as part of a delegation—that every effort is being made. Every effort will continue to be made.

Mr. Hill: Will my hon. Friend tell the true story about the evolution of shipbuilding throughout the world? We have been outclassed, outworked, underpriced, unprepared to deliver ships on time, we have had deplorable labour relations and the trade union movement has been out of control. Will my hon. Friend make it clear once and for all that these chickens are now coming home to roost?

Mr. Morrison: As I have persistently said, British Shipbuilders will get orders only if, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) forcefully points out, it is competitive. That is very necessary. It is fair to add that whether one is talking about the Japanese or European shipyards or anywhere else, there is surplus capacity of ships and shipbuilding.

Mr. Williams: I am astonished that a local Member would sell out his own shipyard and workers in the way in which the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) just did. May I ask the Minister whether he realises that there is now deep gloom in the Swan Hunter yard and Vosper Thornycroft as a result of the placing of a recent frigate order? Does he realise that that means that one of those yards is likely to close? As for the level of protection that one of the yards is receiving, we can guess which one it might be. Can the Minister tell us what plans he has to help those yards, since clearly one local Member has no intention of doing so?

Mr. Morrison: If the right hon. Gentleman were to inquire at Swan Hunter, he would quickly discover that it has a close relationship with my Department and myself. That relationship inevitably means that the sort of communication that it wants with the Government is properly put.

Later—

Mr. Hill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will remember that only a few minutes ago the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), speaking on behalf of the Opposition, made a slanderous attack on me by suggesting that I was speaking against the shipbuilding industry of Southampton. I want to put the record straight. There is no shipbuilding industry in my constituency, although the industry is ably supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price)—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We frequently hear things in this House that we do not like and with which we disagree. I cannot allow the hon. Gentleman to have a second opportunity to answer the point.

Mr. Hill rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the hon. Gentleman to continue. He will have to find other ways to put his case.

Design Education

18. Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he plans any further design education initiatives in the higher education sector and in the schools.

Mr. Butcher: In collaboration with the Department of Education and Science and other interested bodies, the Department continues to support a wide range of design initiatives at all levels of education. In particular, I am examining proposals for the development of business training for designers, extension of the young designers into industry scheme and support for design and primary education, implementing the recent consultative report.

Mr. Wood: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is he satisfied that schools and other educational institutions are paying enough attention to the needs of industry? Is he equally satisfied that industry is taking enough interest in what is going on in schools and educational institutions?

Mr. Butcher: My hon. Friend is absolutely right in his analysis. There has been criticism in the past that design departments should introduce more business discipline into the design curriculum and that business men, especially on business management courses, should understand more about why design has not been used as an effective force in reconquering markets that have been lost to British companies. My hon. Friend has it right, and we reflect those views in our education policy.

Mr. Eastham: The Minister referred to the initiatives being taken to make up for some of the deficiencies. Is it not a fact that industry already recognises many shortages of skills for various parts of industry? Does that not clearly fall at the feet of the Government, who, only three or four year ago, decided to do away with the industrial training boards, thereby creating many deficiencies? Is it not time that there was a rethink with a view to reintroducing proper industrial training?

Mr. Butcher: It is precisely because the Department of Trade and Industry recognises the representations from the engineering industry and the information technology industry in particular, that our skill shortage committee produced a whole raft of policies for reducing the skill shortage, especially in engineering and technology. Some of the other matters raised by the hon. Gentleman are for my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. No doubt those views will be communicated to him.

Irish Foreign Minister (Representations)

3.33 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what complaints he has received from the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Ireland about the conduct of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in Northern Ireland and what response he has made to those complaints.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): I have received messages from Mr. Barry expressing his concern about the events of recent days in Northern Ireland and his assessment of the impact on the nationalist community and in particular his criticism of certain operational decisions of the RUC. I have today issued a statement making clear that operational decisions on routeing of parades are entirely a matter for the Chief Constable. I have also expressed my support for the way in which the RUC sought to deal even-handedly with both communities and to protect law-abiding people from violence from whatever quarter it comes.

Mr. Gow: As my right hon. Friend has rightly made clear, responsibility for operational matters of the RUC is for the Chief Constable and not for him. Will he make it doubly clear that there is no responsibility whatever enjoyed by the Foreign Minister of the Irish Republic for operational matters which fall within the responsibility of the Chief Constable? Will he remind the Foreign Minister of the Irish Republic of the provisions of article 9*(b)* of the Anglo-Irish agreement, that the conference has no operational responsibilities? Finally, is my right hon. Friend aware that the complaints which have been made by the Irish Foreign Minister are only a precursor of further serious disagreement between London and Dublin as a result of the signing of the Anglo-Irish agreement?

Mr. King: The answer is yes, Sir, to both of my hon. Friend's questions. There are great tensions in Northern Ireland during the marching season. I have just returned again from the Province, and my view has again been confirmed that there is a widely held opinion among both sides of the community that the violence, which was extremely regrettable, was very much less than might have been and was predicted by many. I think that much of that was to do with the sensible and wise policing decisions which were taken. I have included in my statement my sympathy to the members of the RUC who were injured during the weekend's events in seeking to protect both communities from violence from either extreme.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Is it not clear that, contrary to statements made by Her Majesty's Government, the Government of the Irish Republic are under the impression that the Anglo-Irish agreement has given them a voice in the internal administration of a part of the United Kingdom? What steps do the Government intend to take to correct that impression?

Mr. King: No, Sir. The right hon. Gentleman, with his knowledge of the Province, knows perfectly well that the Irish Government have always been concerned about issues affecting the Nationalist community in Northern Ireland and have made representations over the years about different matters that have given rise to concern. I think that we should recognise that that has been the practice in the past as well.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): Has my right hon. Friend considered the article written by the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, that appeared in the Daily Telegraph two days ago in which he argued the case against integration and stated that that would be contrary to the Anglo-Irish agreement? Could there be a clearer admission that we have, in effect, surrendered an element of sovereignty to the Republic? Can he be surprised that the Irish Foreign Minister has taken the action that he has?

Mr. King: I am not quite sure how that arises from the private notice question. I note, however, the comment of my right hon. Friend. He will know that it is the Government's policy to seek to pursue an agreed basis for devolved government in Northern Ireland.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Is the Secretary of State aware that, when provocative Orange marchers are properly routed and when Nationalist and Catholic homes are protected properly against murderous thugs, there will be no need for Mr. Peter Barry to make the representations that he made or in the manner in which he made them? Does the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), not to mention the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), really wish to see this role passed back to Sinn Fein of the IRA? I cannot believe that the right hon. Gentleman wishes that to happen.

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman will be aware, with his knowledge of Northern Ireland, of the difficulties that are posed, especially during the marching season and at the time of the 12th. I hope that he will accept from my confidence that every possible thing was done and will be done to protect law-abiding communities on both sides of the community from violence and intimidation of the sort that we have seen. We shall be determined to ensure that every effort is made to bring those responsible to justice.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Would not nearly every hon. Member agree with my right hon. Friend that the RUC deserves the highest praise for its work under the special strain that has been placed upon it since the signing of the Anglo-Irish agreement? Was it not claimed for that agreement that this sort of interfering megaphone diplomacy would be obviated by the existence of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference? Is this not further evidence of the futility of the agreement? Would it not be a good idea to let it wither?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend will recall the strain under which the RUC was put last year at the time of the marching season, as well as this year. It is known that every year this is a time of great difficulty. I am grateful for my hon. Friend's tribute to the RUC. Hon. Members who may not have been present in the Province but who saw the television pictures will have seen the way in which the RUC has stood against thugs and hooligans from both communities in the interests of protecting law-abiding citizens. The RUC has earned our admiration and respect for its efforts.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the Secretary of State explain to those of us who voted against the Anglo-Irish agreement and thought that it was counter-productive why Mr. Peter Barry did not consult him first? Was there any sign that these great public statements were to be made, and was there any consultation with the Government?

Mr. King: Obviously, I was aware of the general concern that the Irish Government have had and continue to have about the position of the Nationalist community and the dangers to which it may be exposed. However, I did not have prior notice of the particular statement which is the origin of the private notice question.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): For those of us who support the Anglo-Irish agreement, is it not singularly painful that Mr. Barry should have made a public statement in which he said:

"I want Nationalists to know that I am determined to see to it that their interests are safeguarded and their physical security is protected."

That is an Irish Minister speaking about British territory. How dare he do such a thing? Could the even-handedness of the RUC possibly be shown more clearly than in the fact that hundreds of its men and women have been shot by the IRA and scores of them burnt out of their homes by so-called Loyalists? The RUC is in the middle. It is doing its duty and it deserves tribute.

Mr. King: I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise that I have paid that tribute unstintingly because I recognise that the RUC must discharge an extremely difficult role. Both communities owe the RUC a great debt of gratitude that the past weekend passed relatively peaceably, although there was still more violence than we would like to see, and certainly more peaceably than many had expected. I understand the concerns of the Irish Government which they have always expressed about the position of the Nationalist community, and the interest that they take. They are also concerned when there may be Republican attacks on Unionist and Protestant homes. Our job is to try to deal even-handedly and to respect both traditions. In the weeks ahead, I hope that we can look to all the people of the Province on both sides of the community also to show that same respect for the traditions of the other side.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is not the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) making a mountain out of a molehill?

Mr. King: That would be for the House to judge. I certainly do not in any way regard the concerns expressed on both sides of the community as making a mountain out of a molehill. We are determined to see proper appreciation given to the RUC and the security forces in the vital work which they do for the preservation of law and order.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Is not the reality that, although the content of Mr. Barry's representations may have some substance, his intervention is both misconceived and counter-productive? Given the Anglo-Irish agreement and the make-up of the RUC, do not Sir John Hermon and the RUC deserve commendation for being able to police the Anglo-Irish agreement? Given that the agreement is now in existence, should not the House support the RUC in its efforts to police that agreement?

Mr. King: It is not a question of policing the Anglo-Irish agreement. I hope that the whole House will support the preservation of law and order and the repudiation of violence from whatever quarter it comes. That is the policy to which the RUC is wholly committed under the leadership of the Chief Constable, and for which it has the Government's full support and mine.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Will the Secretary of State confirm that the Anglo-Irish agreement was to provide a consultative framework, whereby the Republic of Ireland could make representations to Her Majesty's Government on behalf of the Nationalist community in the North so as to prevent ad hoc statements emanating from Dublin which in the past were unhelpful to Anglo-Irish relations? Does not the Secretary of State agree that, at least in the area of public relations, the Anglo-Irish agreement is in its infancy?

There is, of course, an anger behind such statements as those made by the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Ireland that is shared by all right hon. and hon. Members — anger that innocent people in Rasharkin, County Antrim, can have their homes sacked by so-called Unionists, suitably and cowardly masked; anger that there is nightly rioting in the Manor street area of north Belfast; anger at the many incidents of stone-throwing, petrol bombing, overturning of vehicles, injury to limb and loss of life that have become such a tragic feature of the so-called marching season.

Will the Secretary of State convey to the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary our congratulations on the news that nine people have been charged following attacks on Catholic homes in Ballymoney, and seven charged after the Rasharkin attacks, and that a cache of petrol bombs has been discovered?

Will the Secretary of State finally note that those who are the perpetrators, the instigators and the evil hands and minds behind such violence cannot and will not see the Anglo-Irish agreement torn up? This House will not succumb to such inordinate and extreme pressures.

Patience and private representations by all those in positions of influence will have their impact in assuaging the present position when feelings are running so high on the streets of Northern Ireland.

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments about the RUC. He said that feelings are running high on the streets of Northern Ireland, and it is indeed true of some streets. However, one of the messages of last weekend is that the overwhelming majority of people in the Province wish violence to be avoided and civilised behaviour to continue between the communities.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that the perpetrators of violence, from whichever quarter they come, will be sought. I know that the RUC is determined to bring them to justice.

Hon. Members (Dress)

3.47 pm

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This matter may appear to be trivial, but most hon. Members have received on many occasions representations concerned with respect in every form. You made a ruling last week that, if hon. Members were to be seen in this House and called during questions, they could be without a jacket but not without a tie.

Although this may appear to be a small point, respect for the person and respect for property at large are subjects that are dealt with frequently in our mailbags. There must be respect in this House. We look to you, Mr. Speaker, to ensure that a lead is given. Today you called the hon.

Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay), although he was not wearing a tie. Have you changed your ruling, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I think that that is a trivial point. I suggested to the House that we should maintain standards of dress, but I certainly will not put myself in a position that prevents me from calling hon. Members because of the way in which they dress.

Fishburn Coke Works

3.49 pm

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the announcement yesterday by British Smokeless Fuels that it will close the Fishburn coke works with the loss of over 200 jobs."

Three years ago almost to the day, this House debated a proposal to close Fishburn. That debate was the climax of a successful campaign to keep the works open. At that time, male unemployment in the Fishburn area stood at 48·9 per cent., with total unemployment standing at more than 40 per cent.

Today, we are faced with a fresh closure proposal. Yet unemployment in my constituency is worse, with more than 4,000 jobs, mainly in the manufacturing sector, having been lost in the Sedgefield district alone. If Fishburn coke works were to close, the largest employer in Fishburn would be the ambulance station, and even that is under threat.

This is a specific matter because it involves the closure of a coke works and the loss of more than 200 jobs. It is important because communities such as mine face unemployment that increasingly has an out-of-city dimension every bit as critical as inner city dimensions.

The matter is urgent because, over the past few months, although we are told that we are in the fourth year of an economic recovery, we have faced the loss of some 400 jobs at TI at Blaydon, some 300 at ICI at Billingham, 2,500 at the Teesside and Sunderland shipyards, 800 at Tyneside shipyards, and 850 at NEI.

The question that people in the north-east ask is, how much more unemployment in the name of market forces must we tolerate?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the announcement yesterday by British Smokeless Fuels that it will close the Fishburn coke works with the loss of over 200 jobs."

I in no way underestimate the importance of the matter to the hon. Member and to his constituents, but I regret that I do not consider that it is a matter that should be raised under Standing Order No. 10 and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Leyland Bus

3.51 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the failure of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to announce the date for the decision for the future of Leyland Bus."

During trade and industry questions today, Ministers were repeatedly asked when a decision on the future of Leyland Bus would be announced. Ministers constantly refused to give any date. What worries hon. Members, especially those who represent constituencies with thousands of workers in Leyland Bus, is that the Government's plan may be to delay any announcement until the House rises and to make an announcement during the Parliamentary recess.

This is a specific matter because it relates to British Leyland. Naturally, it is important. Thousands of jobs are at stake. If British Leyland is sold to the Laird group on the basis of the Laird group, which is a small bus producer, acquiring a large market share, it will be a bad day for British industry.

It is important that we should have an opportunity to debate this matter, especially in view of the fact that we have not debated Leyland Bus in the context of previous debates. It may be that the Government have an ambition in mind that is not consistent with proper parliamentary scrutiny of this vital industrial matter.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) has asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the failure of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to announce the date for the decision for the future of Leyland Bus."

I have listened with care to what the right hon. and learned Member said. As he knows, my sole duty in considering an application under Standing Order No. 10 is to decide whether to give it priority over the business already set down for this evening or for tomorrow. I regret that I cannot find that the matter that the right hon. and learned Member has raised should be discussed under Standing Order No. 10 and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Abolition of Vehicle Registration Prefix

3.54 pm

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish the vehicle registration prefix and to provide for a continuous series of vehicle registration numbers.

My reason for the Bill is that 20 per cent. of vehicle sales in the United Kingdom are made in the month of August. Unfortunately, that places the British motoring and components industry at a great disadvantage compared with its competitors on the continent. Britain must be able to cope with the August bank holiday and the summer holidays in July. In Europe, August is a holiday month and a dead month for vehicle sales. In July, therefore, our European competitors turn the whole of their production over to right-hand vehicles, thus placing our industry at a great disadvantage.

In Europe, vehicle registration numbers are based not on the year in which the vehicle is produced but on where the owner lives. This happens in France, Italy and Germany. The vehicle's registration number remains the same as long as the person owns the vehicle. It changes only if the vehicle is sold to someone in another district. It would be of benefit to us if we moved to such a system.

I am informed that the police object to this proposed change. They claim that people recognise the prefix in the vehicle registration number and therefore criminals can be traced. That is not totally true. If it were, surely it should apply in Northern Ireland, but it does not. Registration numbers based on postal codes would overcome that difficulty. People will soon be able to recognise the new number plates.

If sales were spread over 12 months, it would prevent the laying off of workers when they return after the July holidays. If we eliminated the advantage that we give to European manufacturers who swamp the British market with their products, we could sell more British cars and components and increase employment. My aim is not to keep up with the Joneses but to provide employment for them. I do not understand why we continually give our competitors a dagger which they can thrust into the stomach of British industry.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Doug Hoyle, Mr. Peter Pike, Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop, Mr. Derek Fatchett, Dr. John G. Blackburn, Mr. Robin Corbett, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Terry Davis, Mr. Chris Smith, Mr. Robert N. Wareing, Mr. Robert Parry and Mr. George Park.

Abolition of Vehicle Registration Prefix

Mr. Doug Hoyle accordingly presented a Bill to abolish the vehicle registration prefix and to provide for a continuous series of vehicle registration numbers: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 24 October and to be printed [Bill 209.]

Opposition Day

[19TH ALLOTTED DAY]

South Africa

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister. So far, no fewer than 16 right hon. and hon. Members have expressed their interest in this important debate. No fewer than five of them are Privy Councillors. I appeal for brief contributions.

3.59 pm

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): I beg to move,

That this House, recognising the danger to the Commonwealth if Her Majesty's Government continues its policy of trying to prevent the imposition of strict sanctions against apartheid, calls on Her Majesty's Government to support the adoption of effective economic measures against the South African Government, as recommended by the Eminent Persons Group, in order to exert strong pressure and thereby promote the ending of apartheid, which is essential to preventing a bloodbath in South Africa with all the misery and political, social and economic chaos which would accompany it.

We are now in the final stages of a drama, the implications of which for Britain, South Africa and indeed the Commonwealth seem to be spreading almost every day. It is the last act of that drama, an act that began less than three years ago in New Delhi when the Prime Minister joined the other Commonwealth Heads of Government in setting the objective of what she apparently then hoped would be a common policy for the whole of the Commonwealth. The objective was defined as the "eradication of apartheid and the establishment of majority rule on the basis of free and fair exercise of universal adult suffrage by all the people in a united and non-fragmented South Africa."

I fear that the Prime Minister has sometimes forgotten those words in some of her recent statements about the objectives of negotiations.

All the members of the last Commonwealth summit in the autumn agreed that sanctions should be adopted to help to achieve that objective, but the Prime Minister's veto led to the setting up of the Eminent Persons Group to report within six months and, failing a satisfactory report, sanctions would be considered at the next summit, which is now under two weeks away.

It is just over a month since the House agreed unanimously a Government amendment to an Opposition motion, calling on Her Majesty's Government "to work actively . . . for effective measures which will help achieve a peaceful solution in South Africa".

In winding up the debate, the Minister of State said that "the measures taken must be effective. They may not be limited to economic measures . . . There is no point in introducing measures unless they have a significant effect on the South African Government."—[Official Report, 17 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 980-90.]

It was that statement by the Minister of State that led the Opposition not to oppose the Government amendment.

Since then the European Community has held a summit conference at The Hague at which the Prime Minister herself endorsed a statement that a national dialogue with authentic leaders of the black population was essential to halt a further escalation of violence, and that such a dialogue required the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and other political prisoners and the lifting of the ban on the African National Congress and other political parties. The same summit meeting asked the Foreign Secretary as the Presidency Foreign Minister to visit South Africa to establish those conditions.

Meanwhile, the Community would consult on further measures that might be needed, covering, in particular, a ban on new investments, the import of coal, iron, steel and gold coins from South Africa. However, the moment that that conference was over, the Prime Minister followed the precedent that she set at the Nassau meeting by rubbishing its conclusions. The chairman of the summit, the Dutch Prime Minister, Mr. Lubbers, told the press immediately after it closed that all the members of the summit had agreed to impose that list of sanctions as a minimum if the Foreign Secretary's mission failed. But the Prime Minister immediately said that that was not true; there was no commitment whatever by any of the Ministers to impose that list of sanctions. She stuck to her story, although Mr. Lubbers, as chairman, was confirmed in his account by the Danish Prime Minister and, indeed, by President Mitterrand. Moreover, it was confirmed in the House a little over a week ago by the Prime Minister's own Secretary of State for Energy, who told us in an answer to a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy):

"The action on South African coal has been agreed by the European Community".

The right hon. Gentleman also told my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse):

"the European leaders have agreed upon an approach to South Africa which after three months would include action on a number of materials, including coal. That is the right approach"— an echo, I suppose, of some propaganda by his party in the past—

"and I hope that it will have some influence on negotiations in the coming months."—[Official Report, 7 July 1986; Vol. 101, c. 3-7.]

Some hope. The Prime Minister sent the Foreign Secretary on his mission, to quote the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley),

"up the creek without a paddle and then brought home without a canoe."

Many of us on both sides of the House will think that, though colourful, that was an accurate description of the fate to which the right hon. Lady condemned her Foreign Secretary.

We all know that the Foreign Secretary never wanted to go at all. He had an altercation with the Prime Minister on the matter as he was entering the aircraft on the way to The Hague. According to one of the newspapers that overheard, she told him, "If that's the way you feel, perhaps you had better not come at all." But he went.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Healey: The Foreign Secretary finally agreed to be the fall guy for the Prime Minister's policies.

Mr. Hunter: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Healey: No, I shall not give way.

What all of us in the Opposition want to know is that if the Prime Minister was really determined on that mission of appeasement, why did she not follow the precedent set by her predecessor, Neville Chamberlain, and go herself? The South Africans themselves have said that if anyone was likely to influence their position, it would be the Prime Minister, whose common sense and sterling qualities they have recently praised in lavish terms.

As it was, the right hon. Lady sent the Foreign Secretary. Almost from the moment when his aircraft left the tarmac at Heathrow, she drove nail after nail into the coffin of his mission with an astonishing series of interviews, which, I heard this morning on the "Today" programme, were described yesterday by the leading Singapore newspaper as a series of provocative statements that seemed designed to destroy the Commonwealth games. If that were their purpose, they certainly seem to have had some success.

I doubt whether any Foreign Secretary in British history has been deliberately exposed by his own Prime Minister to such a series of humiliating snubs from so many Governments. First, we had the casual refusal of President Botha to see the Foreign Secretary at the beginning of his mission. Then we had the refusal of all the leading blacks in South Africa, from Bishop Tutu to Nelson Mandela, to see him when he went there. We had the refusal of the African National Congress to meet him in Lusaka and then a series of humiliating rebuffs from Commonwealth Prime Ministers in Zambia and Zimbabwe. Indeed, I think that he will agree that the only comfort that he had on that ill-starred mission was the offer of prawns by the Marxist leader of Mozambique.

Since then the Conservative Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Mulroney, has given the Prime Minister herself a piece of his mind and told her that if she will not join the rest of the Commonwealth in sanctions Canada will act unilaterally. The Prime Minister of Australia has given her the same message. The fact is that she has not now one single friend left in the Commonwealth and scarcely one left in the European Community, either. The only friend that she has made by her astonishing behaviour in the past few weeks is the President of the apartheid regime in South Africa. No doubt the praise that she received from him was responsible for her nostalgic regret that South Africa was not still in the Commonwealth.

All that, however, was water off a duck's back to the Prime Minister, who told the world, "If I am right and everyone else is wrong, what does it matter?" It matters a great deal to all of us. She has already wrecked the Commonwealth games and we regret that as much as anyone. Far more serious, however, she now risks wrecking the Commonwealth itself and creating a constitutional crisis of major dimensions involving the Palace itself. Events have reached such a stage that newspapers reported today that several of her senior Cabinet colleagues had been warning the press in the past 24 hours about such a constitutional crisis.

Meanwhile, the Prime Minister's arguments have become wilder and wilder. At first, she stuck to the Foreign Office line, arguing against comprehensive sanctions. More recently, however, she has been arguing against any kind of action which might have any effect on the South African Government. She has proved an assiduous acolyte of the Botha charm school in recent weeks. She has accused Bishop Tutu, Archbishop Hurley and the Synod of the Church of England of immorality. She has wept crocodile tears at the potential suffering of blacks in South Africa, but there has not been a murmur of complaint from her about their actual suffering in the past 30 years. Having met some of the church people in South Africa who have made great sacrifices in the fight against apartheid, including a young Catholic priest who has been tear-gassed eight times in the past few months conducting black funerals, I believe that the Prime Minister should apologise in the House for her disgraceful and totally unmerited accusation of immorality.

We have seen the Prime Minister's eyes brim with compassion at the prospect of unemployment in the United Kingdom arising out of sanctions against South Africa, but we now hear that at most 20,000 jobs might be lost if mandatory comprehensive sanctions were introduced immediately. Yet through her own policies the Prime Minister has created 2 million unemployed in this country in the past few years without batting an eyelid. Her display of compassion has deceived no one. As Foreign Minister Botha has said, her policy is determined not by political or moral considerations but by commercial consideration — no doubt a reference to the fact that nearly half the Conservative party's funds, or more than £1 billion, is contributed by firms with operations or estate in South Africa. [Interruption.] I am sorry—£1 million.

The Prime Minister's worry about the impact of sanctions on the British economy is misplaced. It has been argued with unassailable logic by the Eminent Persons Group—a group which included Lord Barber, who has a major financial stake in South Africa and great knowledge of South Africa through his position as chairman of the Standard Chartered Bank—that unless the outside world imposes sanctions there is no chance of the dialogue without which apartheid cannot be brought to an end and without which there will be an inexorable slide into a bloodbath worse than anything since the second world war, to quote Lord Barber himself, in which all Britain's commercial interests as well as all her political influence would be lost. No one has argued that point more strongly than the Conservative ex-Prime Minister of Australia, Mr. Malcolm Fraser, whom no one could accuse of not being a hard-headed Conservative.

The point made by the Eminent Persons Group, which has also been made time and again within and outside the House, is that sanctions are not an alternative to negotiation but the only means of promoting the conditions in which a meaningful dialogue can take place. Nothing, however, can dent the Prime Minister's unassailable complacency and the inspissated ignorance from which it springs. The other day she told the House that the United Kingdom was doing more than any other country in sanctions against South Africa, but my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) listed in a letter to her 16 countries which were doing more. Yesterday, the Prime Minister told my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) that many Commonwealth leaders opposed sanctions as she did, but she could not name even one. She is even rewriting history, quoting Wilberforce of all people in her support the other day for his success in stopping the slave trade. Wilberforce's opponents in the Chamber — the West Indians in Westminster, as they called themselves—used exactly the arguments that the Prime Minister is now using, claiming that the ending of slavery would damage Britain's commercial interests and would be bad for the slaves themselves. In fact, slavery was finally stopped by a naval blockade. The Prime Minister may care to reflect on that precedent.

In her recent series of interviews, the Prime Minister referred time and again to the Rhodesian settlement as a settlement by negotiation which she would wish to follow in relation to South Africa.

Mr. Hunter rose——

Mr. Healey: I will give way in a moment.

The Rhodesian settlement took place only because the Prime Minister reversed the policy on which she was elected, and she did so under pressure from the Commonwealth at a conference attended by the Queen against the Prime Minister's firm advice. The Prime Minister may care to reflect on that analogy. She advised Her Majesty not to attend the Lusaka conference on Rhodesia, but the Queen subsequently issued a statement saying that she had noted the advice but regarded her duty to the Commonwealth as taking precedence over accepting the advice of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford) rose——

Mr. Healey: On that occasion, the Prime Minister continued to apply sanctions as a basis for a settlement. The other factor in producing a settlement was a large scale guerrilla war in which at least 12,000 people lost their lives in the preceding 12 months. As we know—those who do not may care to read an interesting book by Mr. Miles Hudson, then adviser to the Conservative Government—the major influence in getting the Prime Minister to reverse her position was Lord Carrington. Let us hope that his successor will follow his example and have equal success in getting the Prime Minister to reverse her position.

There are some signs of movement. Contrary to what the Prime Minister told the House only last week, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) has made a speech saying that the Government should take active measures to restrain South African trade which could culminate, if necessary, in a trade blockade. If he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker, he may make further remarks along these lines this afternoon.

The right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), who, until the Foreign Secretary, was the Prime Minister's most eminent fall guy, made an interesting speech last week. He said—and I hope that his colleagues on the Conservative Benches will ponder his words—that if the Foreign Secretary "is to stand the remotest chance of success he must go armed with the necessary authority. Whatever their disadvantages, international coercive measures, whether formally labelled as sanctions or not, are one of the few weapons in our arsenal against the citadel of apartheid beyond mere persuasion . . . The world must know of our readiness to have recourse to stronger measures against the Pretoria regime in the event of the failure of Sir Geoffrey's mission. Without that knowledge, the mission will not be just, as is inevitable, formidably difficult, but utterly hopeless."

This is a growing feeling among all in this country and outside who watch the Foreign Secretary's lamentable journey.

Mr. Bowen Wells: What does the right hon. Gentleman think should take place? Does he want to impose a blockade of South Africa, and, if so——

Mr. Healey: That is the point to which I am coming.

Mr. Wells: If he is coming to it, will the right hon. Gentleman spell out what repercussions that would have on the economy, and particularly on the black people of South Africa?

Mr. Healey: I was unwise to give way, because this is precisely the series of points to which I am coming.

The question left is what sort of sanctions are most likely to be, to use the Prime Minister's word, effective—not signs and gestures, the latest phrase that the Prime Minister has produced as a surrogate for sanctions. When she discussed in an interview with Mr. Hugo Young the possibility of signs or signals and gestures, she made it clear that they are not effective, and she is right. I believed before my visit to South Africa—and I said this in the House a month ago—that a gradual escalation of sanctions by stages is the best way to approach the problem. However, since my visit I have changed my mind. I found that every person to whom I spoke in the black community, both inside and outside South Africa, and those business men in the white community—a small minority, some of whom I met in Lusaka and Johannesburg—believe that sanctions are necessary, and that by far the best would be comprehensive mandatory sanctions because they would bring the matter to a head faster. It is no good the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle), the West Indian on the Government Back Benches, wagging his head——

Mr. Bowen Wells: West Indian?

Mr. Healey: I am talking about the West Indians who supported slavery and used the same argument as the hon. Member for Luton, North, which is that to abolish slavery would damage British commercial interests and the interests of the black slaves.

The people with whom I talked, the black leaders, the church people, the members of the United Democratic Front, trade unions, members of the ANC, members of the Zambian Government, all thought that comprehensive mandatory sanctions would be best because they are quickest and sharpest.

The Commonwealth Secretary made a speech yesterday that I hope that all hon. Members will take the opportunity to read, because sneering at the Commonwealth will not save us from a constitutional crisis if the Prime Minister destroys the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth Secretary argued—and there is a good deal in this—that there is a case for something less than comprehensive sanctions. They can be kept as a deterrent against South Africa retaliating on the front-line states againt something less than comprehensive sanctions. I see that the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) sees merit in that. I am glad that this measure commends itself to at least some Conservative Members.

If we do not go all out for comprehensive mandatory sanctions, which would require the acquiescence of the United States Administration and the Security Council as well of the British Govenment, Mr. Malcolm Fraser is 1,000 times right when he argues, as he did in yesterday's international Herald Tribune, that "The purpose of sanctions would not be to destroy the South African economy. They would need to be constructed in such a way as to give the economy and the white population in particular a real body blow. It is not a question of turning the screw gently and steadily, it is a question of a hard blow".

He is right and all those who have come to accept the case for sanctions, with whom I have discussed the matter inside South and southern Africa, take the same view. It would be better to concentrate on banning key South African exports because that is a very much more simple problem than restraining all South African imports.

[Mr. Healey]

Without the currency earned by exports, the South African Government's capacity to import is severely constrained. That would include measures on gold, diamonds and minerals.

The Prime Minister has argued that to do anything on gold would help the Soviet Union. That would be true of a ban on gold exports from South Africa, although such a ban might be evaded to some extent by smuggling, not least from the middle east. If the Governments of the Western world took seriously their often stated desire to de-monetarise gold, the easiest way to achieve this objective would be for the countries with large gold stocks to start selling them off so as to depress the price of gold. This would be beneficial to the monetary system in the Western world, and would hurt South Africa and, incidentally, the Soviet Union.

A ban on all investment is desirable, but it would have little effect beyond what will happen anyway. I have not met anyone recently who is prepared to put a penny of new money into South Africa if he can help it. Most of the big multinationals in South Africa have already begun withdrawing or have withdrawn. For example, some are selling off their machinery abroad. That has happened in several cases. There is a steady drain of trained professional people with marketing skills. I am sure that the Chancellor will be unhappy to hear that, of 160 auditors in South Africa a year ago, 60 will have left by the end of the year. The trickle of whites who left Zimbabwe after independence are returning, because they see the prospects as being far more hopeful than staying in South Africa.

I agree that whatever package of measures is finally adopted must be the subject of collective action of a large number of states, one hopes through the United Nations. I hope that the Prime Minister was being serious when she told Mr. Malcolm Rutherford of the Financial Times in an interesting interview published about a week ago that she would some day go to the United Nations for mandatory collective sanctions, although not comprehensive sanctions.

Whatever package is chosen must be strict and swift. It is no good the Prime Minister thinking that she can put off decisions now beyond the Commonwealth conference, as she told one interviewer during the bizarre burst of reflection to which she treated us 10 days ago. To seek delay now would mean that decisions would come too late and at stake now is not just the fate of the suffering millions in South Africa but the fate of those in the front-line states who are under constant attack and threat from the apartheid regime. At stake is the Commonwealth and the British constitution. I appeal to hon. Members on both sides of the House who value those things to apply all possible pressure to the Prime Minister before it is too late. I ask the House to approve the motion.

4.29 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'reasserts its commitment to the Commonwealth and the goal of peaceful change in South Africa through negotiation; does not believe that general economic sanctions would help to secure that objective; notes that the Government is committed by the Nassau Accord and the Declaration by the European Council at The Hague on 27th June 1986 to consultations with the Commonwealth, the Community and other allies on further measures which might be needed; and welcomes the efforts of the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in his capacity as President of the Twelve to establish conditions in which negotiations can take place.'.

As so often on these occasions, it would not be fruitful for me to try to follow the hyperbolic and fanciful course charted by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). He has roamed far and wide in his reminiscences about my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, with whom he seems to be continually and astonishingly fascinated to the point of hyperbole. He found himself drawn into anecdotage of every kind, finally embarking upon the proposition that we were committed to £1 billion from South African funds. [Interruption.] We recollect his days of mathematical accuracy.

I am concerned to discuss what contribution Britain, as a member of the Commonwealth, of the summit Seven and of the European Community, can make to the prospects of peace, prosperity and freedom for the 32 million people of South Africa. We in Europe should approach the subject carefully because European history is not free of racial conflict. We have no right to strike a self-righteous pose on the subject. European history has taught the world tragic lessons about the evil of discrimination against human beings on grounds of creed or race. So it would be a step forward in our discussion of South Africa if we were to approach that desperately difficult problem with a little less emphasis on our own self-righteousness and a great deal more emphasis on the practical objectives that we should pursue.

If Europe understands this, as it does, and if it understands, as it does, the full strength of the case against apartheid, so too does the Commonwealth. I quote:

"United in our desire to rid the world of the evils of racism and racial prejudice, we proclaim our faith in the inherent dignity and worth of the human person . . . We reject as inhuman and intolerable all policies designed to perpetuate apartheid, racial segregation, or other policies based on theories that racial groups are or may be inherently superior of inferior."

Those words come from the Lusaka Commonwealth declaration which, far beyond the myths peddled by the right hon. Gentleman, my right hon. Friend helped to frame in 1979 as the foundation for the success of the Government that she leads in securing the independent freedom of Zimbabwe. That is the reality of the position of the Government of my right hon. Friend. Those words are the very foundation of this Government's policy towards South Africa.

It is unacceptable to us that the rights of minorities should be suppressed by majorities, whatever their colour. That is why Britain has so often, and even today, provided a refuge for men and women who face oppression at home —from Africa as well as from other continents. By the same token, we cannot accept that the rights of the black and coloured majority in South Africa should be subordinated to those of the white minority in the name of Christianity, civilisation and Western values. It must be said that it is not Christian, not civilised and certainly not in the interests of the West that such a system should survive.

So, too, it must be said that explicit recognition by the South African Government leaders that apartheid must end is an important step in the right direction. We have had just such explicit recognition from the President of the South African Government himself.

What the world now wishes to see—and there should be no difference between both sides of the House on this—is a decisive movement towards a system that will command the approval and consent of all the people of South Africa. [Interruption.] Some hon. Members may be dismayed to hear me asserting these truths, but we hold these views to be most important. We understand something else as well. We understand, and it is right that we should, the fears of some South Africans which act as a constraint on change. We say that those fears are more likely to be fulfilled if grave decisions are not taken to bring about change rapidly enough.

It must be recognised that the decisions that have to be taken will require great bravery. For that reason, we approach the matter with sympathy and understanding. That is why the European Council meeting at The Hague last month underlined the urgent need, not for violence, but to promote dialogue in South Africa and to achieve peaceful change. The European Council fully recognised the importance of the work done by the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group to promote the same objective. That group came into existence not because of the obduracy or intransigence of my hon. Friend but because my right hon. Friend, with other Commonwealth leaders, was able to reach a common position upon the desirability of such a group. It should be acknowledged that that group has been a unique creation which only the Commonwealth could have created. Its work was of enormous importance.

It was because the European leaders had the desire to renew the momentum of the work of that group that they asked me, as President of the Council of Ministers, to undertake a fresh mission on behalf of the 12 European nations. The European Council set precise objectives for that mission. Its objectives were the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and other political prisoners and the unbanning of the ANC, the PAC and other political parties. I do not underestimate the difficulty of that task but I have no doubt that it is right that this further effort should be made.

That is why last week, as the first part of my mission, I was glad to consult President Kaunda, President Machel and Prime Minister Mugabe. I had full, effective consideration of all the issues with those Heads of Government. This morning, I also consulted President Masire of Botswana. It ill becomes the right hon. Gentleman to talk about rebuffs and exchanges of that kind. I have undertaken the mission with the authority of the European Community. Those missions have been of great value and I am most grateful to the Heads of Government whom I have met.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I am not arguing against the Foreign Secretary's mission although I do not think it will meet with success. Suppose that he does everything humanly possible to argue the case with the full backing of the Twelve, but at the end South Africa says that it is not prepared to do anything about getting rid of apartheid, what do he and his Government intend to do?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If the hon. Gentleman can contain himself in patience, he will hear the answer in due course.

Let me tell the House the first of the five important propositions that I put to each of the leaders that I met. First, apartheid must give way to a non-racial, fully representative society. Secondly, it would be wrong not to acknowledge that change in South Africa has taken place, but there must be more change and it must take place more quickly. Thirdly, negotiation still remains the best and quickest means of bringing apartheid to an end. Violence will prolong the process of change and prolong misery. The right setting for dialogue and change should be the suspension of violence on all sides.

Fourthly, I made the point that comprehensive mandatory sanctions would not, as some people like to believe, bring down the South African Government. It is not on the verge of collapse. Finally, for all those reasons, we must continue to identify and exploit every chance and opportunity for dialogue.

Three things emerged from those discussions. First, there was complete—I repeat the word "complete"—agreement about objectives. Secondly, there were significant but understandable differences about the means, including differences between the four leaders whom I met. Thirdly—and this is important—there was a greater readiness to accept the sincerity of the mission that I am undertaking.

I was also able to remind the three leaders of some of the practical and positive actions that we are taking to help to surmount specific difficulties in southern Africa. For the front-line states, these include measures to improve rail and road transport to the outside world and to enhance protection of those links by training for their armed forces, and for the black people of South Africa, the European code of conduct for employers, recently revised, and educational programmes for black South Africans and black trade unions. At The Hague we announced our intention to enhance this programme by £15 million over the next five years.

In the context of The Hague agreement to consult other industrialised countries, a point to which I have already referred, I shall be going to Washington tomorrow for talks with Secretary Shultz and Vice-President Bush. I shall be consulting, as seems to me to be entirely sensible, to see how wide is the common view about the future co-operation. A senior official from my office has already visited Canberra and Tokyo on my behalf, and, as the House knows, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has consulted the Prime Minister of Canada.

Next week I shall go again to southern Africa. I expect to see President Botha at the beginning and at the end of this visit and Mr. Pik Botha, the Foreign Affairs Minister, soon after my arrival. The key to progress in South Africa is self-evidently the position of the South African Government.

I shall use those meetings to explore the intentions of the South African Government to take measures to further the dismantling of of apartheid, to urge on them the need to act rapidly and decisively in this direction, if further tragedy is to be averted, and in particular, and most urgently of all, to press on them the need to release Mandela and other political detainees and to unban the African National Congress and other political parties as an essential prerequisite for any dialogue at all.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): When my right hon. and learned Friend sees President Botha, will he be careful not to impose on the President and the Government of South Africa an absolute timetable of measures that my right hon. and learned Friend expects to be taken? Particularly in relation to the National Party Congress which is to be held in South Africa in early August, will he ensure that he does not ask the South African Government to impose conditions that they will be unable to deliver until they have consulted their own party and their own people?

[Mr. John Carlisle]

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall be presenting the points that I have just described to the South African Government in the context of the definition of my mission arising from The Hague European Council. These discussions will take place against the background of important international meetings that are to be held following my visit. While I am in South Africa I shall seek to meet a wide range of people of all colours, representing all opinions throughout South Africa.

I recognise, of course, that so far there has been reluctance on the part of some South African leaders to meet me in the context of my mission, but, whether or not they agree with our approach, I cannot believe that it is wise for them to withhold their advice at this stage from the mission that I am undertaking. I hope that, on reflection, they will be able to accept the sincerity of the mission that I am undertaking on behalf of the European Community.

The House should recall that this Government, more than any previous British Government, have implemented fully and conscientiously, together with our Commonwealth and European partners, a whole series of measures that are designed to make clear our view of the imperative need to bring apartheid to an end. These measures affect the economic, sporting and cultural relations between this country and South Africa. They have been listed to the House by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and they have this common feature: they have been calculated not to threaten, not to destroy, but to encourage and promote the change, about the need for which we are all agreed.

I wish to leave the House in no doubt about where we stand on the question of possible further measures to achieve that objective. Commonwealth Heads of Government at Nassau agreed that in the absence of adequate progress they would consider the adoption of further measures. At The Hague last month, the European Council committed the Community to enter into consultations with the other industrialised countries in the succeeding three months on further measures which might be needed. As my right hon. Friend said at the subsequent press conference:

"All agree that further measures are not excluded."

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister also told the House on 1 July, certain contingency plans that were outlined in The Hague communiqué are being made. She went on:

"We are not negotiating from weakness. We are negotiating in a way which we believe will have the best chance of success." — [Official Report, 1 July 1986; Vol. 100, c. 822.]

It is precisely in the same fashion that I am conducting the mission that has been entrusted to me.

Mr. Healey: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman clear up a point which I know created consternation when news of the European Community decision reached Africa, because I happened to be in Lusaka? The Prime Minister suggested that it would be a good thing if the Commonwealth summit took no decisions whatsoever on sanctions. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman now suggesting that this matter should be left over for a further few months until there can be a meeting of the European Community, or is he prepared to fulfil the obligation which the Prime Minister accepted at the Nassau meeting to consider and take decisions on possible further measures at the Commonwealth summit in a fortnight's time? If not, I warn him that he is in for very, very serious trouble indeed.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no doubt that at the Commonwealth meeting at the beginning of August and at subsequent Community meetings the commitments we made in each of those respective places to consider further measures will be undertaken. Consideration will be given to them.

However, it is important to understand each of the points that the right hon. Gentleman challenged. There was, and there is, no concept of automaticity about any further measures. There was no misunderstanding about this at The Hague meeting.

Mr. Healey: At The Hague there was misunderstanding.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No. Let me tell the House what the Dutch Foreign Minister told the Dutch Parliament on 2 July. There is no doubt about it. He said that not all countries had committed themselves to the package of measures set out in the declaration of 27 June and that there was therefore no automatic obligation on the Community to take further European Community measures in three months' time. That is the position. It was agreed that each of us would consider measures when the time came for consideration, after the three-month process. It was also agreed that no country would rule out any of those measures and that consideration would take place. That is the position.

Mr. Healey: The right hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that the Dutch chairman of the summit conference, Prime Minister Lubbers, met the press immediately after the conference was over. I have the video tape of his interview. He said that it was agreed by the Heads of Government that measures would be taken if the Foreign Secretary's mission failed. That was endorsed by the Danish Prime Minister, although President Mitterrand said that it was a gentlemen's agreement. Whether that was intended to exclude the right hon. Lady I am not sure. But there is no question that the impression of at least the chairman and other members at that meeting was that a commitment was made, whether formal or informal. Is that the case?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am trying to set the right hon. Gentleman's mind at rest, and I shall try to do so again. Let me return to the words of the communiqué. It was agreed that in the next three months

"the Community will enter into consultations with the other industrialised countries on further measures which might be needed."

They were identified. It was agreed that in that consideration no country would rule out any of those measures but that the consideration would be honourably and fairly undertaken. It is true that different comments were made about that at subsequent press conferences on that day. It was as a result of that that the Dutch Foreign Minister was asked to clarify the position as his Government saw it, and it was in those circumstances that he said what I have just read out: that not all countries had committed themselves to the package of measures set out in the declaration.

Mr. Heffer: He was talking about your Government.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If the hon. Gentleman wants to have the position clarified, he must listen to the clarification given by the Dutch Foreign Minister, as Chairman of the European Council. The Dutch Foreign Minister went on to say:

"There was, therefore, no automatic obligation on the Community to take further European Community measures in three months' time."

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): Would my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it would be very wrong for major steps to be taken before Parliament has been consulted?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: One of the reasons for this debate — and the reason for the debate that we had some weeks ago — is to embrace such consultation with Parliament. I cannot give my right hon. Friend a firm commitment in the light of the Government motion passed by the House, without opposition, prior to the European Council meeting. The interest of Parliament in this matter is understandably intense and that is why we are discussing the matter in detail now.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall not give way again.

There was and is no concept of automaticity about further measures. However, we have agreed to consider these measures. I am engaged in a mission to southern Africa, not to promote measures, but to seek changes and commitments to progress which are desired by hon. Members on both sides of the House, the European Community and the Commonwealth. It must be recognised that I may not achieve those changes. If the mission does not procure tangible and substantial progress in South Africa, I would regard agreement on further measures as likely to be necessary.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): My right hon. and learned Friend has raised a fundamental point. So far this afternoon he has implied that there is a trip wire which immediately, or soon after his return, can generate substantial further measures. He also implies that there are conditions which he expects to achieve when he reaches South Africa. Is it not of the most fundamental importance that these conditions are known and clearly defined?

We are talking about the end of apartheid. What precisely does that mean? Does it mean merely the elimination of all the discriminatory legislation which has appeared on the statute book since 1948? That has always been the definition that we have been asked to accept in this House. Alternatively, does it now mean something more profound — a change in the basic social and economic conditions in that country? If the latter is the case, that applies not only to South Africa but to many other countries in which such social and economic conditions may be found today. There is no basis on which we can discriminate against South Africa in the latter case as opposed to the former.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: One of the areas of common ground in this debate has, sadly, been the need to deal separately and distinctly with the case of South Africa. That has been the characteristic of meeting after meeting of the international community and of meeting after meeting of this House.

I understand the importance of my hon. Friend's wide-ranging inquiry, but the objective of the mission — as agreed at The Hague — is for me to visit southern Africa in a further effort to establish conditions under which the necessary dialogue can commence. The necessary dialogue will allow negotiations leading to a truly democratic and non-racial South Africa. According to The Hague communiqué:

"This dialogue cannot take place as long as recognised leaders of the black community are detained and their organisations are proscribed."

That is the importance of the two objectives about which I have reminded the House on several occasions. That is the nature of the mission and it is clearly defined.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Like my right hon. and learned Friend, I share the view that few of us believe that economic sanctions in themselves are a cure-all. Equally, not many of us believe that no further measures should be considered and most people of goodwill would support my right hon. and learned Friend in what he is trying to achieve.

The other day we debated an Opposition motion on this subject and the Government removed the word "economic" from the motion, leaving open the proposition that other measures could be considered. Will my right hon. and learned Friend consider a point which has not been raised so far today? While the political power in South Africa is largely in the hands of the Afrikaners, much of the economic power still lies in the hands of British South Africans, many of whom enjoy the right to a British passport — even though many were not born here — which they use to travel around the world. In his future consideration of measures, will my right hon. and learned Friend consider that point?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend's point is not lacking in ingenuity and it raises some difficult questions. He may have an opportunity to elaborate upon it in a further intervention.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East underlined the point conceded some weeks ago by his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), the deputy leader of the Labour party. That belief is at the heart of the speech made by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East. It is that a policy of general economic sanctions would not be in the interests of the British people or the people of South Africa. If that is common ground, as I take it to be from the right hon. Gentleman's speech, it is an important point that should be recognised. That point was at the heart of the speech made today by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, it was at the heart of the point made by the deputy leader of the Labour party and it is on that basis that I would address myself again to my mission.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Before the right hon. and learned Gentleman leaves that point, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) asked what would happen if the right hon. and learned Gentleman's mission did not achieve its intended success. That point has not been answered despite the undertaking that it would be. As the Foreign Secretary is representing the EEC, if the absolute conditions of the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and the equally unconditional unbanning of the ANC do not happen as a consequence of his second or first meeting with P. W. Botha, what will the Secretary of State do? The Secretary of State's earlier statement that he will be prepared to consider further measures will not impress the Afrikaners or the rest of the world.

[Mr. Neil Kinnock]

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman has failed to take note of what I have already said. It is beyond doubt that, within the Community and the Commonwealth, consideration will be given to the question of further measures on the basis of the objectives that I have described repeatedly in the course of my speech. That appraisal will be undertaken on the basis of the further important point that if the mission does not procure tangible and substantial progress, I would regard agreement on some further measures to be necessary.

Before I was interrupted, I was embracing the common ground that I thought had been established. The Opposition, neither in the motion nor through the speech of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, will not press us to make general, comprehensive economic sanctions. That is an important advance.

There are many families in this country with a real human interest in the future of South Africa and there is also interest in the rest of Europe. In Africa, the human interest in the future of South Africa is even more intense. All these people want a future of peace and justice in South Africa. My mission is not easy but it has a chance. With the support of this House, I will continue to strive for the success of that mission.

4.59 pm

Dame Judith Hart (Clydesdale): I begin with the assumption that follows on from the Foreign Secretary's last words that, between now and the next opportunity that the House has to debate the subject, matters will have moved on and the Prime Minister will have had to appreciate the need to take further measures. That is not an unreasonable assumption. The Foreign Secretary went as near as he could to admitting that that will be the case and that during the next two months, during the Commonwealth summit meeting in London, and then in preparation for further meetings, the Government must move towards fuller consideration of further measures.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) mentioned some of the measures that he believes would be effective. He mentioned coal, gold and arms. He said—as we have all noted today—that South Africa has just announced the manufacture of a new aircraft, which means that until now the arms embargo has been ineffective. It has allowed South Africa to develop its manufacturing capacity for arms, its oil and its air flights.

What distresses me—I say this to my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East as well as to the Foreign Secretary—is that we are not devoting the essence of the debate to considering precisely which sanctions are likely to be the fastest acting and most effective, but will, at the same time, have the least effect on the front-line states and will be totally enforceable. I emphasise the last point because, from my experience when trying to deal with sanctions against Rhodesia, too many commercial buccaneers are supported by their Governments, as was the case with the United States and West Germany and their evasion of the sanctions against Rhodesia in respect of minerals, especially chrome. One must be certain that whatever one does is enforceable, otherwise it becomes nonsense. One must be certain that the measures one takes are effective. If the aim of sanctions is to produce a negotiated settlement and peace instead of a bloodbath, they must be rapidly effective.

It disturbs me that the outstanding area where all of this could be achieved has not even been mentioned in the debate. That is financial sanctions. I draw to the attention of the House, of my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East and of the Foreign Secretary the simple fact that, in the United States, as most of us know, the lobby and the passion of public opinion on South Africa is infinitely greater than it is in Britain. The Congressmen and Senators must heed public opinion and behave accordingly on the issue.

In 1975, the House of Representatives passed a Bill, and in April of this year the Senate passed a Bill by a majority of over 90 to 3, which has now gone to the Senate Finance Committee. Of course, anything can happen to it there and, ultimately, President Reagan could veto it. Nevertheless, it has gone through the House of Representatives and the Senate. The Bill is highly specific. It calls for a total embargo on financial relationships between American financial institutions and South Africa—that includes an embargo on new investments, new loans and the rolling over of loans—and on any more of the negotiations that took place in January and February this year which rescued the South African economy. At the same time, the Bill calls for the entire disinvestment by transnational corporations based in the United States.

If there are to be rapidly effective sanctions, it is important, as the Foreign Secretary said, that the Security Council of the United Nations reaches agreement on this. To do that it is important to have the support of the United States for whatever is agreed. There is no better starting point for that support than a Bill which has gone through Congress and the Senate and is sitting in the Finance Committee with overwhelming support of public opinion in the United States. Not only that, but the Bill has met no great resistance from the American business community, which seems to be more capable of recognising its long-term interests than is the British business community.

If one looks ahead, whether to negotiation or a bloodbath, it is historically evident that in the not too far distant future the world will deal with a black South Africa. Any business interest, such as the South African Chamber of Commerce, which, as I mentioned in the previous debate, gave evidence to the panel of which I was a member, must recognise that its future lies in coming to terms with that simple fact.

It is ludicrous that the House does not give more attention to studying the ins and outs, the pros and cons and the problems and the advantages of introducing early severe financial sanctions. Let me take a possible disadvantage. What would happen to the British interests in South Africa? The Bank of America recently pulled out of South Africa completely with apparently no grave disadvantage. Barclays Bank has retreated and has transferred its interests in South Africa.

The Foreign Secretary, as far as I know, has in his economic relations department only three officials and a couple of boys capable of considering the economic aspects of the issue. He might have called in masses of people from the Treasury, but I doubt whether they would be terribly helpful. If one considers the self-interest of the British banks, it is doubtful whether any bank has extended its operations in South Africa to the extent where withdrawal would cause it any problems. The position is not the same as the over-extension of some British banks during the debt crisis in Latin America. I doubt whether the self-interest of British banks presents an insuperable barrier to their going along with us. Indeed, they would have to if legislation was introduced for withdrawal, no new loans, no rolling over of loans and no rescheduling of loans to South Africa.

Why could that be important? We do not have much experience to go on. However, we can mention one experience. In August last year, South Africa was in a difficult financial position. It was seeking rescheduling of loans, new loans and a rollover of loans. The rand took a tremendous tumble. By January and February, with the assistance of the Swiss banker who raced all over Europe to try to whip up support for rescheduling, but who has now withdrawn because he says that not as much progress has been made as he understood would be made, the crisis was over. But between August and then when the rand was under tremendous pressure and when South Africa was desperate about its financial position, we saw some of the smallest but most dramatic moves forward in the attitude of the South African Government towards making concessions on apartheid.

In January or February rescheduling was agreed and everything was wonderful. It appeared that there was no more need to worry about South Africa's financial position. From that date began the events leading up to the state of emergency and all that has happened since. That is only a short period historically, but people cannot quote anything else in evidence and it is strong evidence.

The greatest influence on political change in South Africa, as in every society which is basically capitalist—I use the word not pejoratively but factually—will come from the business community. If the business community is worried, there will probably be the pressure for change. If the Foreign Secretary wishes pressures to achieve negotiation, the business community is priority number one. I do not understand why, in all the talk about general economic sanctions and comprehensive mandatory sanctions, we are not analysing closely what could be done and what measures would be likely to be the most effective.

I mention again briefly the role of the transnational corporations, because the Bill that has gone through the House of Representatives and the Senate calls for complete disinvestment by them. That is presumably something on which we could agree with the Americans to go to the Security Council. We would not be starting from scratch. President Reagan may not like it any more than the Prime Minister would like it, but it is at least a starting point for agreement with the Americans without which no sanctions can be effective.

During the consideration which the Foreign Secretary will give, on his forthcoming visit to South Africa, and I would suppose during the weeks that follow, when precise support for some sanctions must be forthcoming from the British Government, the financial sanctions so much neglected in the discussion on South Africa should be given a first and important priority. Out of all of the possible measures, I would pick that as being of top priority in terms of effectiveness, being enforceable, creating the least damage to the black South African states and achieving the process of political change.

5.10 pm

Mr. Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): I have listened with great interest to the right hon. Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart). I hope that the right hon. Lady realises that in the United States the Rev. Leon Sullivan and his principles have had a big impact on Congress and on American business. That is understandable because Congress represents a large black population in the United States. At the same time, the United States percentage of interests in South Africa is limited, and they have been able to bring about a situation in which Congress has led business initially to suspend further investment and, secondly, to consider complete withdrawal from South Africa.

I do not agree with the right hon. Lady that British firms are unaware of the issues and that they do not feel deeply about them. My experience is that the great majority of British firms in South Africa have done an enormous amount to try to improve conditions, certainly in their own plants. This is certainly true in Namibia, where they have been remarkably successful in removing so many discriminatory practices. Rio Tinto-Zinc has, for example, been able to end the custom whereby black workers return to their own homes for six months and then go back to Namibia. All such families now live and work permanently in Namibia. RTZ has also been able to deal with the problem of the differences in promotion prospects between coloureds, blacks and whites. In so doing RTZ has achieved a considerable amount.

Dame Judith Hart: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman is right about how many British firms have applied principles similar to those of the Rev. Leon Sullivan. However, I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that RTZ is operating illegally in Namibia.

Mr. Heath: I do not understand the right hon. Lady's point about that company operating illegally in Namibia.

Dame Judith Hart: The United Nations resolution makes it clear that the exploitation of minerals in Namibia is illegal unless done under the control of a popularly elected Government.

Mr. Heath: I realise the import of that resolution passed by the United Nations. I was talking about the worthy efforts made by British firms to remove entirely discrimination in Namibia.

The situation in South Africa is absolutely abhorrent and the British people who see it night after night on their television screens loathe what they see and everything connected with it. The situation is now one of the utmost gravity and time is short. I hope that the Foreign Secretary will realise this when he visits Washington and Pretoria.

[Mr. Heath]

At the same time as loathing what it sees in South Africa, the country is also confused and the Government must take responsibility for this. The House is in the same situation tonight. We are debating this most important and complex situation on the basis that Opposition Members are arguing for effective deterrents, and the Government are arguing for "not overall" deterrents. Do "not overall" deterrents exclude effective deterrents? The Government have emphasised that they have already taken eight actions and the Foreign Secretary said this afternoon that some are economic. The denial of oil to South Africa is an economic action as is the denial of dealings in the Krugerrand. However, we are told that there must not be economic sanctions because they are not effective. This confusion is leading to a completely false situation and is, I regret to say, giving the impression that it is only with the greatest reluctance that the Government are considering the situation in South Africa and taking action on it.

I wish my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary well in his difficult mission. He is right not to be frustrated by attempts to deter him. I hope that he will recognise the need to take effective action and to make it plain that such action will be taken. Therefore, he must deal with the very important point that the South African Government believe that, when it comes to the crunch, whatever and whenever it is, they will always have the support of the American Administration and the British Government. The South African Government are firmly convinced of this because they believe that they can always use the Communist threat as the argument with which to handle Washington and Whitehall. Whenever one reads the speeches——

Mr. Amery: What about Simonstown?

Mr. Heath: I disagree with my right hon. Friend. I think that we always disagreed about this. There was a time when I thought that Simonstown was important in world strategy and East-West relations. It is no longer important. Nor do I believe that South Africa is of any importance in any possible East-West arms clash.

The irony of the situation is that the longer South Africa continues its present policy, the more it drives its black population into Communist hands and the more it is encouraging the other black states in Africa to move towards a Communist outlook. We must deal with this ironic situation. I hope that the Foreign Secretary will impress, not only upon the Secretary of State in Washington but upon the President, whom he is bound to see, that every time it is said that South Africa is a bulwark against Communism, the South African Government's policies on apartheid and the political development of South Africa are reinforced. Until that argument is completely wiped from our minds we shall be unable to make any progress with negotiations.

This progress may come about only after further action on sanctions has been taken. We must get away from the confusion of whether such actions are measures or whether they are sanctions. The purpose of them all is to persuade the South African Government to change the situation.

A myth has grown up about Rhodesian sanctions. It is not true to say that sanctions had no effect on Rhodesia. They did take a long time, but they had the effect of inducing Mr. Smith to negotiate with my noble Friend Lord Home, when he was Foreign Secretary, something which Mr. Smith had previously refused to do.

Mr. John Carlisle indicated dissent

Mr. Heath: It is no good my hon. Friend shaking his head. He was not here at the time and knows nothing about it. Negotiations did take place, and if Mr. Smith had been prepared to move further and then get the support of the black population in Rhodesia a far better situation would now exist in that country. This is another lesson which I hope can be brought home to the Government in Pretoria.

Another lesson to be learned is that, as a result of Mr. Smith not being prepared to go so far, there was then an internal crisis of revolt. This was, of course, fed from outside the country and that will happen in South Africa, too. The consequences will also be the same. There will be ghastly bloodshed, the Government will be swept away, and the white population will be in a worse situation than if they had developed properly today. I am sure that this is right and I am glad to see the Foreign Secretary nodding his head.

Sir Ian Lloyd: My right hon. Friend implied a few moments ago that the sanctions imposed on Rhodesia were wholly responsible for bringing Mr. Smith to the negotiating table. Does he agree that, at that time, the most significant role was played by the South African Prime Minister who was unwilling to see that situation continue on his northern border, and who therefore brought great pressure to bear on Mr. Smith which was far more effective than any sanctions which the United Kingdom was able to impose?

Mr. Heath: It was because of the sanctions imposed on Rhodesia that the South African Prime Minister saw a situation developing which he could no longer tolerate. That is why Mr. Smith agreed to negotiate. It was a combination of both facts.

When will the President of the Republic of South Africa and his Ministers recognise that their country is now in the same situation as was Rhodesia when he told Mr. Smith to negotiate? That is a key question, and I suggest that the Foreign Secretary must bring about a recognition from South Africa that it is now in the same situation as was Rhodesia.

The Commonwealth is in great peril, as is our position with our European allies. In part, that again is due to the Government's emphasis, which appears to be negative, on what they will not do instead of being forthcoming and emphasising what they have already done. They should emphasise that the purpose of the visit is to secure a negotiating position and, if it fails, further action will be discussed and taken.

In saying that further matters will come under consideration, the Foreign Secretary opens up the gravest doubts among everybody as to whether the Government are serious. The Government can say that after consideration they will decide what further action they will take. [Interruption.] The Foreign Secretary said that it was for consideration. If they say that after consideration they will take further action, that is a positive attitude, and by now the Government must have had time to work out what steps they will take.

I agree that there is a great deal of room for moving along with financial arrangements. If the right hon.

Member for Clydesdale talks to the banks, I think that she will find that very few are prepared to regard South Africa as creditworthy and therefore they are not taking action. But it is possible for the Government to agree to take action about the banks in South Africa. Of course, it is possible for them to agree, as has been suggested, about the withdrawal of consular representation. It is possible for them to take action about airlines which, as has been suggested by the leader of the Social Democratic party, might in some ways be very effective. It may be that we shall have to give notice of when we shall cancel those airline arrangements and do that legally. If that takes time, it is hanging over South Africa that unless it embarks on serious negotiation there will be that interference with its communications.

On trading questions, agriculture is probably the best subject on which to start. Of course, each of those measures will cause hardship to people and one cannot estimate how great that will be. But if we are determined to deal with the problem of South Africa internally, its apartheid and its political position—its democracy or lack of it—it is necessary to recognise the consequences of pursuing such policies.

Mr. John Carlisle: My right hon. Friend talks about the consequences of further economic sanctions and offered to the House the example of soft fruit. Does he not understand that at the moment, because of the limited sanctions that have already been imposed by other countries, including Britain, dole queues are lengthening in eastern Cape and there is now hunger and starvation in that part of Africa? If the measures that he advocates, particularly in relation to soft fruit where the majority of the labour force is black, came into effect, there would be widespread misery in that part of the world. Is he willing to have that on his conscience?

Mr. Heath: And the Government may be changed. Of course I realise what is going on. The main purpose is to get the Government to change their policy or to change the Government. We must be frank about that. That is what the whole question is about. Those who are genuinely concerned about apartheid and the political institutions in South Africa recognise that that is the situation and there is no point in hiding it.

Industrial goods are a more difficult matter to handle. But all these things must be done in conjunction with the Community, the United States and Japan, and, if possible, with as many other countries that are involved as possible. One of the things that worries me most is that Congress will use its powers, the President will be forced to go along with it, and we shall then find ourselves still more isolated unless we too are prepared to take further action in that respect. To be isolated from the United States, in the Community and also in the Commonwealth, is the worst possible situation in which we could find ourselves.

My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) raised the question of those who are already starving. Of course, I know about that. It has been on every television screen, as have the poor whites who are unemployed as well. That is the consequence of having a Government who behave in this way. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] What is necessary is to ensure that the neighbouring African states have a full realisation of what is involved in each of the actions that we are taking. That is another of the differences between Rhodesia and South Africa.

During the days of sanctions against Rhodesia, large supplies went through Rhodesia to the African states. They would never admit it and we have never troubled them with that publicly, but it went on. What will happen in this case when the original right of entry is closed? How will they be kept supplied and how will they deal with their trade? Has that been discussed with them? We do not know whether my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed that with them during his recent visit, but it is of crucial importance because they will no longer have the channel of supply, in and out, which they had in those days.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) has said that I mentioned a blockade. If one comes finally to having to go for full sanctions, I do not see how they could possibly be enforced without a blockade. Therefore, we should recognise at the beginning that that is what it would come to. If my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North wants to deal with apartheid, as I assume that he does, and with the political situation there, he must face up to that fact because that is what is required.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East discussed the questions of sanctions being immoral. I do not quite understand the argument about sanctions being immoral.

Mr. Healey: The Prime Minister did.

Mr. Heath: I should hate to think that my right hon. Friend and her colleagues on the Front Bench who sat in the Cabinet between 1970 and 1974 when we had sanctions against Rhodesia thought that we were indulging in orgies of immorality. That really would grieve me. I do not think that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary feels that today or felt that then. No, these are measures which one is loath to take, but one must balance the pros and cons.

On trade and industry, 40 per cent. of capital investment in South Africa is British and we are likely to lose that unless we show those who are the majority and who will one day have power that we recognise that fact. A large part of our trade is with South Africa, but we must also recognise that we have twice as much trade with black sub-Saharan Africa as we have with South Africa. If black Africa decides to act against us on this question, our trade with it will suffer far more than our trade with South Africa.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As a former Prime Minister, would the right hon. Gentleman care to comment on what he sees as the role of the Palace in this situation?

Mr. Heath: I regret that the role of the Queen—let us use the proper terminology in this matter—has been brought into public discussion. The Queen is Head of the Commonwealth and in that position she understands fully her responsibilities in a constitutional situation. I have no doubt about that and it is not necessary for anyone to bring the Queen's position into this question.

We shall all regret it if countries leave the Commonwealth. At least, I shall certainly regret it immensely because the Commonwealth still performs a useful function. I regret the withdrawal of countries from the Commonwealth games in Edinburgh. But my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and members of the Government are the last ones to complain about that. Look at the political pressure that they used in 1981 to stop our teams going to Moscow after Afghanistan. That was a political question and this is a political question. I saw some of the inside work on that and why the British sailing team did not go, so we had better be a little modest in our attitude towards withdrawals from the Commonwealth games and just regret them and hope that they can be prevented.

This is a grave situation, moving with great rapidity. I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will carry out his task with the utmost determination but we must be realistic and appreciate that he may not succeed. We must then be prepared to follow that up with the policies that we are discussing today and I hope that he will be well prepared to do so and can give confidence to the Commonwealth and to Europe that the British Government will play their part in dealing with this increasingly dangerous situation. If that is the fact, we must, as far as possible, try to achieve unity in Britain on what we are going to do.

We lived through 15 years of Rhodesian sanctions and we all saw the disunity that was caused then in some parts of our country and in some parts of the Conservative party in particular over that matter. The last thing that we want is to have a similar argument across the Floor of the House about the measures that we are taking. We should do the utmost we possibly can to reach agreement about this to deal with apartheid and the political institutions in South Africa so as to bring about peaceful change as speedily as we can. The responsibility is on us, Government and Opposition and all Members of the House, to ensure that the country understands the issues and the reasons for the action being taken and that it is as united as possible behind them.

5.29 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I am sure that if only the Prime Minister would overcome the resentment that I fear she still harbours and listen to what the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) has just said she would follow his advice.

The Foreign Secretary had an opportunity this afternoon to undo some of the damage that has been done by Government statements, especially by the Prime Minister's statements, during the past few weeks. I fear that he did not succeed. He might have been able to undo some of the damage if he had confined his speech almost entirely to the sentence which ran:

"If my mission were to fail, I would regard agreement on some further measures as likely to be necessary."

That is not the form of words that I would have chosen, and it does not go quite as far as the form of words that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup suggested, but if that had been the general signal of his speech, it would have led to a great deal more hope and set at least some minds temporarily at rest around the Commonwealth. It would have given the impression, which I am sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman wants in his heart to give, that he enters the Commonwealth meeting at the beginning of August determined to take that line.

However, the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech had so many deferences and so many obeisances to the views of the Prime Minister that the signal that he might have been giving was hopelessly confused. The right hon. and learned Gentleman travels about on his flying missions giving the impression increasingly that he is endowed with no more authority than the Queen's Messenger who carries Foreign Office bags from capital to capital or the cabin crew pouring the drinks on the plane. For that to be true of a Foreign Secretary who is universally liked, widely respected and generally thought to have the best interests of the Commonwealth at heart is ludicrous and humiliating. If that proves to be his position at the end of his mission and when the Commonwealth leaders meet at the beginning of August, I hope that he will not allow himself to remain in that posture.

It must be very difficult to give up the office of Foreign Secretary. It is a very noble office, but there is a level of humiliation to which that office ought never to be brought and to which no occupant of it should allow it to be brought. I hope that that will be firmly in the Foreign Secretary's mind in the little time which remains before the meeting of Commonwealth leaders.

It is not the Foreign Secretary who is the problem in all this. While he whispers about possible measures, the Prime Minister screams her defiance. Any signal which the Foreign Secretary gives is wholly overborne by the message that she gives. She has appeared day after day on television screens. She has given long interviews, and her message has been seen and heard in every part of the Commonwealth and the rest of the world. She responds in a seemingly uncontrolled manner, expressing her violent disapproval of sanctions and even of some of the more modest measures that have been discussed today. When the people of the Commonwealth and others see her, they can draw only one conclusion—that she is not prepared to contemplate any measures which she thinks might bear heavily on South Africa.

Standing out of the Prime Minister's interviews is an anger, an emotion and a zeal, one fraction of which, if it appeared to be dedicated to the cause of ending apartheid, might get us somewhere. The Prime Minister's emotion and anger is, however, directed entirely at the measures which the majority of people and countries suggest should be used to deal with apartheid. I have never seen the Prime Minister expending in a television or radio appearance the type of anger and emotion on the issue of apartheid that she expends on the means of which she disapproves. That is what leads me to believe that the proportion is all wrong —her emotional commitment is about the means and not the ends. Whatever views the Prime Minister may hold about the evils of apartheid—I take her at her word when she says that she disapproves of it and wants it to be changed—her emotion is expended not upon those evils but upon the issue of which means are to be used.

Sir Ian Lloyd: Surely my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is entitled to hold vehemently the view, as she does, that if sanctions will produce not the end of apartheid, which we all want, but the destruction of the South African state, they are undesirable.

Mr. Beith: But not one atom of that vehemence is directed against what is happening in South Africa now. I acknowledge that she disapproves of apartheid, but her emotions seem gravely misdirected.

What is the Prime Minister saying about sanctions? She says that she does not believe in general or total sanctions —some of the time because she does not think that they will work and some of the time because she thinks they will do harm. There is considerable inconsistency between those two views. Half of the time she is implying that the effect of sanctions would be negligible because many countries will not participate, and half of the time she is implying that their effect will be so strong as to harm those parts of the population which we are most anxious to help.

I shall leave that inconsistency aside, however, to consider the more immediate issue, which is that the Prime Minister never allows herself to be questioned on specific sanctions and measures. Every question that she has answered in the House during the past five or six weeks has been answered as if it were a reference to general, total, mandatory sanctions. She has never allowed herself to utter a comment which was clearly and separately addressed to specific measures.

What is the right hon. Lady's motive for doing that? The effect is to give the impression that there are no measures which are likely to be effective which we would contemplate supporting. If she believes that certain measures are damaging, why does she not come out in support of such measures as she thinks will have a more desirable effect or such as she can accept will not have all of the undesirable consequences that she has mentioned in regard to general economic sanctions? Her failure to show support for such measures repeatedly undermines the Foreign Secretary's repeated insistence that some further measures will be considered. What is her attitude to the report of the Eminent Persons Group?

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, by adopting that attitude, the Prime Minister devalues in advance those moves which ultimately she will have to make, and therefore gains no credit for herself or Britain?

Mr. Beith: That is absolutely right, and any step that the Prime Minister is forced with obvious reluctance to take at the Commonwealth leaders' conference will seem that much less because of the vehemence with which she has denounced all sanctions hitherto.

The Prime Minister has never given a clear statement on whether she agrees or disagrees with the Eminent Persons Group, about which she has often spoken in general. That group said:

"We are convinced that the South African Government is concerned about the adoption of effective economic measures against it. If it comes to the conclusion that it would always remain protected from such measures, the process of change in South Africa is unlikely to increase in momentum and the descent into violence would be accelerated. In these circumstances, the cost in lives may have to be counted in millions."

In all of her references to the hunger which she believes would result from general economic sanctions, what is her view of that statement? What is her answer to the EPG, which said:

"The question in front of Heads of Government is in our view clear. It is not whether such measures will compel change; it is already the case that their absence and Pretoria's belief that they need not be feared defers change. Is the Commonwealth to stand by and allow the cycle of violence to spiral?"

The Prime Minister daily answers, in effect, that she is prepared to stand by and see the cycle of violence spiral.

What is the effect of all this? On the South African regime it is as the EPG says—they think that they are all right. They think that they have a friend in the Prime Minister and praise her lavishly. They believe that she is their last bastion of defence against economic pressure. That has been said again recently in a radio broadcast, and it is being said with increasing fulsomeness.

What is the effect on the black majority population? They increasingly believe that Britain is their enemy. From their distant point of view, it is hard for them to distinguish between the Prime Minister, who in their eyes represents Britain, and the country as a whole. We know from what is said in the House that the Prime Minister's view is widely contradicted. We know that there is increasing public dissatisfaction at what she is saying. There is now substantial public sympathy for measures against South Africa.

The view from the townships, however, is that Britain is not a friend of the majority population. We have to try to change that. What hope is there for the future if our relations with South Africa—there will be majority rule in South Africa in our lifetime—if we have been seen to crush that state's aspirations year after year? Where is that country to look for support if it has been denied it by us? It will look to those countries most ready to offer it, such as those in eastern Europe or the Communist world which can see a political advantage in gaining the allegiance that might come from such support. What is the alternative to violence if the people see no support coming from us? The Prime Minister is offering nothing to the majority community in South Africa.

What is the effect of all this on the Commonwealth? It is tearing it apart, just as it is tearing the Edinburgh Commonwealth games apart. I was horrified yesterday afternoon that the very mention of the name of the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth evoked a loud jeer from Tory Benches. Many of the hon. Members on the Tory Benches this afternoon may not have been there then. The Secretary-General has sought to present the views of Commonwealth countries to the best of his ability, and to present the consensus within the Commonwealth. That a man occupying a civil servant position such as that should be castigated and jeered by Tory Members is an indication of the extraordinary depths to which the Conservative party is sinking in its attitude to the Commonwealth.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): It is not fair of the hon. Gentleman to say that the Secretary-General was jeered. That is not the right word. The Secretary-General was not appointed to be spokesman of the Commonwealth. That is not his job. He has a responsible job and, of course, he is entitled to express his own views on anything. However, he is not entitled to say that he speaks on behalf of the Commonwealth because he does not.

Mr. Beith: It would be extraordinary if the Secretary-General went around the capitals of the Commonwealth stating those views which are in direct contradiction to those reached at recent Commonwealth conferences. All the Secretary-General seeks to do is to voice the views which Commonwealth conferences have agreed upon. He has the evidence of the recent conference at Nassau on which to base those views. Of course, he must take some account of change and developing events in the meantime, as any person in such a position would. It would be an extraordinary Commonwealth Secretary-General who, in these circumstances, chose to pick out the views of the Prime Minister and advance those rather than the views of the Commonwealth leaders who were in a majority at the meeting.

Mr. John Carlisle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Beith: I must make some progress in what I had intended to be a brief contribution.

The Commonwealth is a source of enormous strength to its members. It is a community of political co-operation which crosses the north-south barrier. It is something very precious and we should be striving to maintain it. It also has great trade importance. There are about £7·5 billion worth of imports from the Commonwealth to this country and £8·5 billion worth of exports from this country to the Commonwealth. We should be deeply concerned about its future.

I must say to those Commonwealth leaders who are thinking that they should leave the Commonwealth if it is unable to act coherently and sensibly in this matter that that is not the question that they should be addressing. The question is, what is wrong with the leadership of the Commonwealth if that comes about? We are moving to a position, in the course of these events, where countries other than Britain will be seen to occupy the key leadership position in the Commonwealth, countries such as Canada, India, Australia, and Nigeria. They are closer to the consensus of views within the Commonwealth. It is extraordinary for Britain, with all its historical involvement in the development of the Commonwealth, to put itself in that position.

Far from seeing this as a time for leaving the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth leaders should see the solution to the problem, if they are unable to carry the British Government along with them, in the assertion of leadership from different quarters within the Commonwealth. That would be part of the maturing process of the institution.

The Government should be working on a programme of measures which they would be ready to bring in the moment the Foreign Secretary's mission is completed. We have had enough delay. If the Government go to the August meeting with the intention of another leapfrogging delay saying "We cannot agree on anything because we have to wait for the next European Council of Ministers meeting and if we cannot agree there we must wait for another session of the House and then there will have to be another Commonwealth conference", the whole process could go on for ever. The Government must be looking at measures such as the banning of intercontinental airline flights and of new investment, not because that would have a profound effect in itself, because very little investment is taking place, but because it would be a signal. They must be prepared to look at bans on specific products and attempts to re-enact the rescheduling crisis that faced South Africa recently.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): If the hon. Gentleman is calling for a ban on new investment in South Africa, will he explain why last week the Liberal party abstained in a vote which would have stopped the tax relief under the personal equity plan of income and capital gains from shares in companies trading in South Africa? Is it not a case of the Liberal party saying one thing and doing another? How does the hon. Gentleman answer the charge of inconsistency?

Mr. Beith: It was an extremely badly worked out proposal. Its effects on companies in Britain could not be so precisely estimated as to distinguish between trading activities in South Africa and trading activities in the rest of the world. It was a piece of gesture politics. It was not an efficient gesture which could be brought to bear effectively on those companies really trading in South Africa. That was the conclusion we reached. The temptation was to vote against it because it was so badly conceived. However, we did not want to appear to support the Government's general resistance to any kind of measures. It was an attempt to introduce in the context of the Finance Bill a proposal which was not adequately worked out.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham) rose——

Mr. Beith: I must not give way any more because many hon. Members wish to take part.

At the same time as doing all that, we must continue the process of discussion with the front-line states to see that we are ready to assist them, especially over issues such as transport. I give the Foreign Secretary credit for the fact that he has not blunted or stopped that process. It is taking place. It was taking place before he went to Lusaka. With that there must be a commitment that we are prepared to strengthen our assistance. Zimbabwe is deeply involved in seeking to maintain through Mozambique transport routes which are threatened by the direct intervention of South Africa in supporting those who are attacking the routes. It is an irony that the routes which were used to defeat sanctions against Rhodesia are now the routes which may not be open, unless the troops of Zimbabwe can keep them open, to enable sanctions to be carried out.

The British Government must be ready to assist the front-line states. We support the motion and we believe that the signal which should be coming from the House and the country is that we are on the side of the majority community in South Africa in its desire to have democratic rights and in its desire to break down a system which has oppressed the majority for so many years. All those who share that feeling on the Conservative Benches should be ashamed that the speeches of the Prime Minister give the impression that the Government and Conservative party do not share that aspiration. They have only to talk to the leaders of other Commonwealth countries to realise that that is the impression they give. This may be one of our last opportunities to make clear where we stand on this issue.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): With the greatest respect to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), I utterly and profoundly disagree with the sentiments he has expressed. I regret that Opposition Members — and I include here the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed — do not appreciate that in this general debate on South Africa there is much more common ground between us than there is gulf. We share the one objective: to seek to encourage those who can overthrow apartheid to do so, and to create in its place a form of government acceptable to all races. That is the common ground.

I listened to the remarks of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). I detected in his utterances what I would call three fundamental inner flaws. In his absence I address them to the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), and I hope that he will reply to them when he addresses the House.

The first inner flaw, the point of omission from all of the sincere utterances of Opposition Members—I do not doubt their sincerity—is the failure to appreciate that there has been significant change in South Africa. That change does not go far enough. I do not think that any of us would say that it does. However, things have happened in South Africa over the past five years which were utterly inconceivable 10 years ago. That acknowledgement is missing from the thesis presented by Opposition Members. Job reservations have gone, the Mixed Marriages Act has gone, influx controls have gone, the tricameral Parliament is established, freehold rights for blacks have been extended and we have a declaration of educational parity for all races. That could not have happened before. Let us hear acknowledgement of those facts in the thesis presented by Opposition Members. Of course it is not enough, but the winds of change are blowing through South Africa.

On the second inner flaw, I find myself, with great regret, quarrelling profoundly with my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). Even if sanctions were to work economically, they would not work politically. If we destroy the economic well-being of the Afrikaner, we will not turn him overnight into a western liberal. The reverse is the reality. If we destroy the economic well-being of the Afrikaner, we shall force him into the inner laager, which means the defeat of the very objective which should unite all hon. Members.

The third inner flaw in the argument presented to us by the Opposition is their failure to account for what I believe to be another fundamental factor. Were South Africa to indulge in counter sanctions, we would be obliged to call off our sanction programme within, say, 12 months. The rest of southern Africa is far more dependent on the wealth and economy of South Africa than South Africa is dependent on her markets in the borderline states and elsewhere in the African continent. We know that 99 per cent. of Lesotho's imports, 91 per cent. of Swaziland's, 88 per cent. of Botswana's and more than 66 per cent. of Zimbabwe's, Zaire's and Zambia's come from South Africa. How can the rest of the world undertake economically to make provision for that which counter sanctions would deny to the rest of southern Africa? I believe that the imposition of sanctions is a non-starter.

Those are the inner flaws in the Opposition's argument. As I have said, I acknowledge the sincerity with which they are advanced. I applaud what my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister have been saying in contending that sanctions pre-eminently are unlikely to be effective. It is a horrific reality that some countries and many companies prefer money to morality. Sanctions would not be implemented effectively. That is a pragmatic view and it does not mean necessarily that we should not embark on the course of sanctions, but let us not kid ourselves that they will work.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup acknowledges that it would be immigrant workers, the indigent blacks and the front-line states who would suffer from sanctions if they were to be effective. I am not prepared to shoulder that moral burden. If they want sanctions, they can apply them themselves. The immigrant black workers can get out of South Africa. The indigenous blacks can withdraw demand and labour, and the front-line states can withdraw their demand. They do not do so and they ask us to do it for them.

I welcome the reaction of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and that of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to treat with disdain and cynicism the meaningless talk of democracy and one man, one vote within South Africa. Where in the rest of the African continent is the example? Where is the paradigm of virtue and the respecter of minorities that we can point to and enable us to say to South Africa, "Follow that lead"? We know what the answer is: absolutely nowhere.

I want genuinely to know the answer to another question. If we have a President of Tanzania who says that he does not believe in democracy, Westminster style, and if we have a President of Zimbabwe who says that he does not believe in Western-style democracy, why should a President of South Africa believe in Westminster-style democracy?

Mr. John Carlisle: Perhaps my hon. Friend will reflect on the fact that no black African Government have ever been changed by the ballot box.

Mr. Hunter: I accept that entirely. I do not have my hon. Friend's experience or knowledge of African affairs and I welcome his intervention and do not challenge him.

The Commonwealth dimension now enters the debate. We must be on our guard. The Commonwealth is not ours. It is not a confederation of former colonies over which we preside. It is a brotherhood of independent nations which are equal members. Likewise, the Commonwealth games are not ours. We are inviting other Commonwealth countries to come to Edinburgh to participate in various athletic pastimes. It would be tragic if the Commonwealth were to suffer grievously as a result of the stance that is now being taken by certain Commonwealth Governments, but I will not be bullied or browbeaten into doing what I know to be wrong to preserve a mistaken concept and understanding of the Commonwealth.

There are at work in South Africa forces of evolution, not revolution. The object of our diplomacy should be to identify and encourage those forces of evolution. I am talking about the body of white thinking which is far in advance of the South African Government and that body of black thinking which does not want the way of violence and revolution. I applaud and support the stand which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs have taken. I hope most sincerely that they will not be deflected from the course of truth.

5.56 pm

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): There was a considerable contrast between the speech of the Foreign Secretary and that of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). Peppered throughout the Foreign Secretary's speech were phrases such as "further measures are not excluded", "we shall consider further measures" or "there is no automaticity", the last word being a new one for me. Everything that the right hon. and learned Gentleman said was qualified and conditional.

As the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said, time is short and we are in great peril. Time is short, as the Eminent Persons Group made clear in South Africa. If something does not happen very soon—this can never be said too often to those such as the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter)—there will be a bloodbath in South Africa. If something is not done to change the Government's policies very soon, the Commonwealth will break up. The consequences of a failure on the Government's part to do something practical and positive are likely to stretch far beyond South Africa and far beyond Britain. That failure so to act will have profound consequences for the world. That is why I agree with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup that time is short and that we are in great peril. We are expecting from the Government a greater sense of urgency and a larger measure of commitment than was apparent from the Foreign Secretary's speech.

[Mr. Guy Barnett]

I have mentioned the Commonwealth and it was mentioned by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup. I was sorry when it was said that the Commonwealth still had a role to play, or still was an asset. I take a different view. I believe that the Commonwealth should have a growing role in the world in future, and I believe that it will. It has already played a vital part. I do not think that the Commonwealth has ever received the credit that it deserves for the settlement of the Rhodesian issue. It played a far larger part than most hon. Members are prepared to accept or admit. I have in mind the part played by Malcolm Fraser of Australia, Michael Manley of Jamaica, Julius Nyerere and other leading statesmen of the Commonwealth at the time, including our then Foreign Secretary, Lord Carrington. I believe that the part which the Commonwealth played was crucial and was a major success.

The report of the Eminent Persons Group is another major achievement of the Commonwealth. It can be too easily dismissed by hon. Members—most of them are on the Government Benches—who are inclined to say, "We can forget about the Commonwealth. It has no further relevance as far as we are concerned. We are part of Europe." I do not accept that view, for several reasons. As the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed rightly pointed out, the Commonwealth is a vital organisation. In world affairs it is unique because it brings together some of the richest and poorest countries. It brings within its compass nations facing enormous problems of poverty, economic development and debt. It is also the only organisation that encompasses practically every racial group in the world.

It is interesting that practically every country in the Commonwealth has a racial or tribal problem to contend with. Only recently we noticed the tragic position in Sri Lanka and the Sikh problem in India. Leaders in east Africa are trying to sort out the almost intractable problems which they inherited from Britain when we formed those countries with little or no regard to racial groups.

If the hon. Member for Basingstoke is asking for a two-party democracy in east Africa, he is crying for the moon. Those countries have a terrible job trying to build a nation from their inheritance. If he wants an example of a democracy in Africa, I can give him one. I visited a democracy in February: Botswana is a two-party democracy with a remarkable measure of freedom and a great regard for the political system inherited from the United Kingdom. To criticise Commonwealth countries only a quarter of a century after they gained their independence with all the problems which they must face is absurd, especially when one recognises that this country evolved towards democracy over many years.

Mr. John Carlisle: The same rules apply.

Mr. Barnett: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman wishes to interrupt or merely to shout, but clearly he has something to say.

Mr. Carlisle: Do not exactly the same rules and conditions apply to South Africa as those which the hon. Gentleman so eloquently described in relation to east Africa? Can he not accept that the South African people will not move towards one man, one vote precisely because of what has happened in other Commonwealth countries and the problems which they face?

Mr. Barnett: I do not think that that is true. African Governments have tried to move to one man, one vote. It is inadequate to argue that there has never been a change of Government because the system of democracy adopted by many Commonwealth countries has led to Ministers losing their constituency seats. Therefore, an important form of democracy is being worked out. In some ways it is influenced by African traditions of democracy which those countries are right to attempt to follow rather than slavishly following the two-party Westminster model. Something exciting and important can come from that.

The Commonwealth is an institution which brings together a great variety of races in different countries. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup was a member of the Brandt Commission and he will recognise the important contribution made to it by the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth. He will also recognise, as most hon. Members do, that the Commonwealth still has a major contribution to make on that issue because it contains so many rich and poor nations. It has published a number of documents and statements which are significant and valuable to the international debate about how we can solve the problems identified by the Brandt Commission. I would be desperately sorry to see the Commonwealth break up, but we are in great peril of that.

The situation in South Africa is also frightening. Yesterday afternoon some of us were privileged to listen to a talk given to the British-Zimbabwe parliamentary group by the Speaker of the Zimbabwe Parliament, Didymus Mustasa. He spoke movingly about how Zimbabwe, its President, Prime Minister and Government want to retain the closest possible relationship with the United Kingdom, and many points he made have been confirmed in this debate. We do a great deal of mutual trade, and many relationships exist which we hope will continue to exist. Many members of the Zimbabwe Government were educated at British universities, which underlines the importance of extending opportunity to Africans and other members of the Commonwealth to study at our universities. But Speaker Mustasa said that the behaviour of successive British Governments has been such as to drive Zimbabwe into the arms of the Russians. Those are almost his words.

Zimbabwe was unable to get any assistance from us when Didymus Mustasa was in the bush among the freedom fighters. How much assistance did he get from British Governments when he was fighting for the independence of his country? He got some assistance from my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) who ensured that every refugee from the Smith regime could obtain education here, and we are reaping some of the benefit from that now. But how much assistance did we give those people? How much assistance are we now giving the African National Congress? How much assistance could we give, given all the talk of the hon. Member for Basingstoke and others about the plight of the front-line states and about how terrible it would be for them if we applied sanctions against South Africa? How much assistance are we prepared to give? That is the key question.

Mr. Anderson: My hon. Friend probably knows that the Government have just announced that they will offer an additional £15 million over five years to southern Africa. He may like to put that in the context of the £400 million a year which is being spent on the Falklands.

Mr. Barnett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that staggering comparison. [Laughter.] The laughter of Conservative Members demonstrates that there is little sympathy or interest from a certain section of the Conservative party. Their words and jeers are not worth listening to. It was interesting to note the flak that my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) received from a certain section of the Conservative party. Frankly, it could not care less about the needs of some of the front-line states and the problems which they face as a consequence of the murderous attacks made on them and the attempts to destabilise their regimes. The £15 million is peanuts, considering the problems which those states face.

We should think seriously about assisting those countries by providing military equipment and, if necessary, soldiers to enable them to defend their borders, especially the Beira corridor, so that they can have a trade link separate and independent from South Africa. That would protect them to some degree from the type of consequences which have already arisen but which will inevitably arise increasingly when economic sanctions are applied. We should not pay attention to the crocodile tears of Conservative Members.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): The hon. Gentleman is a distinguished and long-serving member of the Labour party. Is his view that, if necessary, British troops should go into the borderline states to maintain sanctions part of Labour party policy? Perhaps he will expand on that because it is an important aspect which was touched on by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath).

Mr. Barnett: When my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) replies officially for the Labour party, I hope that he can give the hon. Gentleman the firm official answer that he requires. That is certainly something which I have been pressing in the House for some time and it would make an important contribution. The hon. Gentleman may already know that the British Army makes a valuable contribution in Zimbabwe by training the Zimbabwe army, and that there are already British troops in Zimbabwe. Therefore, it would be a natural extension for Britain at least to send equipment or to give other forms of military assistance to enable those defenceless countries to defend themselves against the attacks that they have received from the south.

I do not want to detain the House much longer, but I feel that I should underline the points that I have made —that I agree strongly with the speech of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup; that we are in peril; that time is short; and that decisions must be taken. I hope that the House listened carefully to what my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale said about sanctions. Much more debate needs to take place in this House, and I think that my right hon. Friend's speech was one of the more constructive in the debate so far. Basically, my right hon. Friend said that there was no point in the absurd argument about whether measures were or were not effective. We should decide what effective measures could be taken, judge which were likely to have the desired effect —the effect that I hope every hon. Member wants—and recognise that this is not cheap debate, but an issue of deep concern to everyone in the African continent. It must be of deep concern to everyone in the world.

6.10 pm

Sir Frederic Bennett (Torbay): I wish first to anticipate possible interventions in my speech. The last time that I spoke on this issue several remarks were directed across the Benches to the effect that I had business interests in South Africa. I have none and have never had any. Perhaps that statement will save at least one intervention in my speech.

I shall barely comment on the speech of the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) because it wandered into the realms of fantasy. As he represents a party that constantly votes against Defence Estimates because it believes that we are spending too much on the armed forces, it was rather odd that he should contemplate sending expeditionary armies to half a dozen countries on the African continent, and maintain them there to repel hypothetical attacks from South Africa. His speech, I repeat, took the debate temporarily into the realms of fantasy.

I have almost the same view of an earlier suggestion that, if necessary, we should enforce a boycott. Contrary to the comment of my right hon. Friend the former Prime Minister, I was in the House at the time of Rhodesian sanctions and witnessed their effect. Even that limited boycott was a grotesque and unsuccessful farce. We had an aircraft carrier steadily rusting away and one or two auxiliary ships cruising steadily outside Lourenco Marques but Rhodesia's trade continued to go through both South Africa and the port of Beira in Portuguese south Africa. Eventually, the aging vessel was withdrawn, before perhaps it sank to the bottom of the ocean. I shall return to Rhodesian sanctions later as an example of what could or could not happen in South Africa.

My first visit to South Africa was in 1947. I spent some time both in South Africa itself and in what was then Rhodesia, now Zimbabwe. I have three distinct recollections of that time, and I have regarded them constantly as valid right up to the present day—despite many frequent subsequent visits during which, at universities and other institutions, I have to the best of my ability warned about the inevitable consequences of apartheid, unless changes were made while there was still an atmosphere of moderation in which to make them. On one occasion, surprising as this may be to Opposition Members, my remarks were quoted as proving that I must be the only Communist in the British Conservative party —a label not usually attached to me. Therefore, my conscience is clear on my attitude of trying to induce people to change their minds before change became brutally and cruelly inevitable.

The first of my three recollections is that, having travelled throughout South Africa, this House made the fatal mistake — as did most European and other countries — of not recognising that South Africa has evolved not as a country but as a continent comprising a whole series of peoples—black, white and other shades —who are just as different one from the other as the peoples of the continent of Europe. If one day we could understand that and take a different approach, we might help to create some form of satisfactory Government within the context of that multiracial continent. We might then, in this House and elsewhere, begin to talk sense.

The idea that there is a greater community between the Asian living in Durban, a Cape coloured, some of the black African tribes, the Afrikaner or the rural members of the so-called homelands and the Zulu is the same as saying that there is no difference between people living in Spain, in Sweden or in Greece. It is utter rubbish. If people visited South Africa not on a carefully arranged propaganda trip but to learn about the people, they would understand that we are trying to deal with a continental problem with fundamental racial differences.

My second recollection is of the certainty of the doom of apartheid. I saw it coming as long ago as 1947. As a young man, I thought that apartheid was an immoral concept. However, unfortunately plenty of immoral concepts and immoral states continue to survive. The Foreign Minister of one such state visited this country within the last few days. That country—the USSR—has survived on a wholly immoral basis since the Communists first gained power. However, a country can have an immoral totalitarian system provided that it is totalitarian.

What doomed the South Africans to the crisis that has now arisen was that they tried to have the best of both worlds. They tried to educate and provide a better standard of living—and therefore being bound in the process to foster greater aspirations — for the very people whom they would inevitably dominate if their system of apartheid could continue. The sowed the seeds of their own destruction long before the Commonwealth, the United Nations or anyone else got round to it. How could they have thought that they could send black people to educational institutions to gain a higher degree of education, to train to a high level to work in industry, and thereby to obtain a standard of living higher than any obtainable elsewhere in Africa without realising that they could not prevent the emergence of political aspirations? That is why apartheid was doomed from the start. It was based not only on immorality but on total unfeasibility in the long term. Indeed, I am surprised that it has taken 40 years for them to begin to understand that. In 1947 I bet £100—and I am not a gambling man—that apartheid would end within 20 years. Unfortunately, I was 20 years out and so lost my £100 — yet my concept of what would happen has turned out to be correct.

The third and perhaps the most important of my recollections is that no one in the House should underrate the built-in obstinacy of the Afrikans. Once again, we made a fatal mistake at the end of the last century when it took the whole might of the then British empire to bring the Afrikaners to their knees. It took three whole years before they would give way. If we think that stopping Krugerrands coming into this country or imposing any of the other suggested sanctions can be done without carrying the Afrikaners with us—and I am not talking about the ridiculous suggested boycott with non-existent ships cruising up and down—we are wholly wrong. On the other hand, I believe that my right hon. and learned Friend can carry Afrikaner Ministers with us, because they will listen to reason provided that we do not force them publicly to denounce themselves. If we did that, that Government would fall and another even more extreme Afrikaner Government would emerge. If we say, "If you do not do this and this, we will do that and that," we shall not succeed. If anyone thinks that that is the way to handle an Afrikaner, it is time that he paid a visit to that part of the world.

It is, therefore, time to begin looking at reality, and I therefore wish now to discuss the present position. When we talk about sanctions and measures, I wish that we could return to real history and not the rewriting of it. In the 1930s, people launched into a high moral code about sanctions to prevent Italy from conquering Abyssinia. That is never quoted, because it is inconvenient to remember that the only result was that Italy took Abyssinia more brutally than it should have done. She used mustard gas instead of more conventional means quickly to achieve her objectives.

The Rhodesian sanctions have been mentioned several times. It is not true to say that sanctions of themselves brought down the Rhodesian Government. That is selectively to rewrite history, which we do too much to suit certain individuals. I visited Rhodesia at the height of the sanctions period. For the first time in their history, the Rhodesians had had to bring in car parking regulations for Salisbury because there were more cars on the roads than ever before. Half of the vehicles came from France and the other half came from Japan. Yet both of those countries were subscribers to the sanctions exercise.

What happened in Rhodesia—let us state the facts and not what we would like it to be—was that the Portuguese empire collapsed and the roads to the coast through Beira and Lourenco Marques were blocked. Rhodesia had no seaport and the only route remaining was through South Africa. The South African Government forced the Rhodesian Government to give way on the propositions put forward by Lord Carrington and others, because the South African Government were not prepared to carry alone the flak for Rhodesia being able to survive against world opinion in case the flak was then directed at them. It was a statesmanlike measure from their point of view to try to induce the Rhodesians to give way. However, that is history. Certain right hon. and hon. Gentlemen, and others, do not like history. What I have said can be easily proved.

Mr. Heath: I do not know whether or not my hon. Friend is referring to my speech, but the fact is that they brought Mr. Smith to negotiate with Sir Alec Douglas-Home. That is a matter of fact.

Sir Frederic Bennett: My right hon. Friend has already reproved several of our hon. Friends because they were not MPs at the time and did not know what they were talking about. I hesitate to say the same thing to my right hon. Friend, because he was here and did know all about it. Yet he must accept my opinion that it was not sanctions—they had gone on for 15 years—that brought Rhodesia to the negotiating table. It was the collapse of the Portuguese empire, as I have said, and the fact that the South African Government was left with the sole responsibility, which it was not prepared to take, to keep Rhodesia going. That is how I and most of my colleagues see the facts. Certainly, the history books do so.

When the Russians invaded Afghanistan, there was an outcry about sanctions. It was said that if we operated sanctions against the Soviet Union, and if the Americans led the way by withdrawing wheat supplies, Russia would be forced to withdraw from Afghanistan. She is still there and she is still killing people. The Americans have found that their wheat ban had no result, because Russia was able to get its wheat from other sources. The pathetic attempt to induce change in Afghanistan by way of sanctions has been shown for what it is.

I have visited the Library and I have checked on the United Nations records. The biggest breaker of sanctions against Rhodesia, including France and Japan, was the Soviet Union. No one has mentioned that in today's debate. We have talked about getting the consent of the Americans. What better understanding can we have than what the Russians would do if we exercised sanctions against South Africa? If the Russians were to do what they did in the case of Rhodesia, sanctions would become a dangerous farce.

If the sanctions are ineffective and are only an irritant, they will do nothing but strengthen the South African Government who will then say, "We can go on as we have always done, because whatever the West does, it is not effective. We can continue unchanged." If the sanctions are effective in the only sense that they can be, they would cause large scale unemployment. They would cause intense misery to the very population we are trying to help, according to the precepts on the Opposition Benches.

No one has mentioned today the estimates that have been given that if the comprehensive, mandatory and immediate sanctions which the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) espouses were implemented, up to a quarter of a million job losses could occur in this country. Will the Opposition include that in their programme?

Mr. Barnett rose——

Sir Frederic Bennett: I shall not give way.

Mr. Barnett: Twenty thousand.

Sir Frederic Bennett: Let the hon. Gentleman then tell the people in his constituency that he is willing to advocate even the loss of 20,000 jobs there. I prefer the figure that has been provided from other sources that up to a quarter of a million job losses may occur. If hon. Members will not admit that, it shows that they are not prepared to admit the consequences of what they seek.

One of the factors that does not help us to get a receptive hearing in South Africa is that South Africa thinks that the world is ideologically prejudiced and biased against its Government, and, of course, its white inhabitants. I have received a number of letters pointing out that this is the 10th anniversary of Soweto and, therefore, it is an occasion for special feelings. Yet I have not noticed many motions on the Order Paper pointing out that it is the 25th anniversary of the Russian invasion of Hungary when 20,000 Hungarians were killed. Why do we not have motions calling attention to that anniversary 25 years later?

Twenty years ago the Berlin wall was built. I wonder why we have not had a series of demands from the Opposition for a debate to commemorate the 20th anniversary of the Berlin wall.

The acts of hypocrisy in which members of the media and hon. Members indulge, when we are trying desperately to send the Foreign Secretary on his way with a real prospect of trying to get a negotiated settlement, makes his task all the more difficult.

6.26 pm

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): The hon. Member for Torbay (Sir F. Bennett) referred to the loss of a quarter of a million jobs. The Prime Minister has referred in the House to, I think, 120,000 job losses. The Foreign Office has brought the figure down to 50,000. Two independent reports, to which I referred in the House a few weeks ago, cited a figure of between 12,000 and 20,000. To talk about a quarter of a million job losses can only have come from a leak from the South African embassy.

I shall refer to how the feelings in this country are manifesting themselves. I am a member of the Anti-Apartheid Movement. I am privileged to be on the national executive committee of that movement. Two weeks ago, we had a demonstration and a festival in the streets of London. Many pop stars participated, free of charge. More than 200,000 people—some say that the figure was 250,000—participated at one time or another during that day of events. It was probably one of the biggest demonstrations on an international issue in the United Kingdom for over a quarter of a century.

All types and classes of people attended the demonstration — blacks, whites and coloureds. The Christian Church was well represented, as were many political parties. That manifestation on the streets of London showed to some extent the feeling in the United Kingdom. The Anti-Apartheid Movement has hundreds of branches in this country. Through those branches, the movement is implementing the people's sanctions, the people's boycott of South Africa, which is having an effect. The membership of the movement increases daily.

A recent opinion poll showed that the British people, rather than being hostile to sanctions—the debate is at a level where people are becoming involved — are in support of sanctions against South Africa. Unfortunately, the Prime Minister came out of that poll rather badly. She was perceived by the British public as a supporter of P. W. Botha and of the apartheid regime in South Africa.

Not only has the Prime Minister brought the British Government into disrepute in the international arena but we are discredited. Because my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) clearly outlined that issue, I shall not go into the details. It is a sorry and serious matter when a British Prime Minister is regarded in that manner by the international community. That can do untold damage in the short and the long term.

In October 1985, at Nassau, an agreement was made to apply, in the Prime Minister's words, "teeny weeny" sanctions. The other members of that conference, because of their sincerity, took on trust the Prime Minister's argument that the Eminent Persons Group should go to South Africa. Some of us condemned that proposal at that time but, nevertheless, it went ahead.

In October 1985, at Nassau, a motion was tabled on the agenda, and was subsequently included in the accord released after the meeting, that eight further measures against South Africa should seriously be considered if the EPG did not make progress in bringing about change in South Africa.

There has been a change of mind. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East said that he had changed his mind from supporting bringing in progressive sanctions to supporting the imposition immediately of fairly strict sanctions.

What will Heads of Government consider in London on 3, 4, 5 August?

"(a) a ban on air links with South Africa;

(b) a ban on new investment or reinvestment of profits earned in South Africa;

(c) a ban on the imports of agricultural products from South Africa;

(d) the termination of double taxation agreements with South Africa;

(e) the termination of all government assistance to investment in, and trade with, South Africa;

(f) a ban on all government procurement in South Africa;

(g) a ban on government contracts with majority-owned South African companies;

(h) a ban on the promotion of tourism to South Africa."

They are not major sanctions, or not as we would interpret them. They are minimum sanctions which we should seriously consider. I should be pleased if the Minister will tell us how far the Government are prepared to go.

The penultimate paragraph in the conclusion of the EPG report, which was unanimously agreed, stated:

"The question in front of Heads of Government is in our view clear. It is not whether such measures will compel change, it is already the case that their absence and Pretoria's belief that they need not be feared, defers change. Is the Commonwealth to stand by and allow the cycle of violence to spiral? Or will it take concerted action of an effective kind? Such action may offer the last opportunity to avert what could be the worst bloodbath since the Second World War."

Those strong words ask for the minimum sanctions which will be discussed on 3, 4, and 5 August. Those questions should be answered by the Minister of State.

Invariably, I come in at the fag end of debates on South Africa, so I should like to speak for just two more minutes. Reference has been made to the support of £15 million. In the past two or three weeks, I have written to 34 British multinationals. Because of the national service agreement in South Africa, British multinationals with subsidiaries in South Africa are subsidising the military. Following two years of conscription, the wages of those who go for further training with the military are topped up by the British multinationals. I have heard from reliable sources in South Africa that employees of European multinationals, who are paid and subsidised by their companies, have been seen on the backs of wagons used in the so-called "control" of the streets of South Africa but, in fact, have been shooting blacks. The sum of £15 million is being sent to South Africa through British multinationals subsidising the military. These multinationals are also topping up their employees' wages. That is nothing less than scandalous. I hope that multinational companies will play their part in stopping this type of subsidy to the military.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): The hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) has given me two minutes to speak, although I hope that he does not time me closely.

The House should be deciding precisely how we can take measures that will generally change the position and free the blacks in South Africa. It is easy to posture and make grandiose statements about so-called sanctions which we should take while knowing full well that we shall sleep easily in our beds and nothing will happen.

I have been to South Africa—not on a Government-sponsored tour but on an independent tour. My group had the opportunity to meet people such as Bishop Tutu, Buthelezi, Allan Boesak and various Ministers. Right hon. and hon. Members would be foolish if they believed for one moment that they could bounce the Afrikaner Government into doing anything that they did not want to do. We cannot do that. That is why it is right that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary should at least try to do what he can.

The only group that can facilitate change in South Africa is big business. Those people have economic muscle. About 20 years ago, they abolished apartheid in their own enterprises. Mr. Botha, the state President, is faced with a divided Cabinet—on the one hand, there is Mr. Pik Botha, who is after the state President's job, and, on the other, there are people who are against the so-called "reforms" which Mr. Botha says he wants to introduce. I sincerely believe that, if my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary fails in the next few days in Pretoria, the British Government will have to put forward positive measures which will send a signal of disapproval and which we hope will be effective. We must not for one moment fool ourselves into thinking that such measures will bounce the thoroughly wicked Government in Pretoria into changing their position one iota.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): The quick answer to the point raised by the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) is that the South African Government can bask in their defiance because they know that, ultimately, they can rely on the British Government's support. So long as they labour under that belief, they will refuse to make the necessary moves.

Apparently, the Foreign Secretary has moved a little from the Prime Minister's intransigence. One can interpret the right hon. and learned Gentleman's points, with all their qualifications, as meaning, "If there is no tangible progress towards securing the objectives, some further measures, in my view, are likely to be necessary."

What is the Foreign Secretary's definition of "progress"? He has set as his task that of convincing the South African Government that Nelson Mandela and the other imprisoned leaders should be unconditionally released and the major parties should no longer be banned. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman be content to take the South African Government's word about a release at some future time, or will he make the release of Nelson Mandela a certain aim without which he will give a commitment to the House to embark on these "further measures"? So far the Foreign Secretary has been coy about that point.

The Foreign Secretary knows from his dealings with the South African Government that they will try to play for time and present some sort of agreement which is full of loopholes. He knows, for example, the long delays over the independence of Namibia from Security Council resolution 435 of 1978. If he wants further examples of the duplicity of the South African Government, let him look at those secret missives in relation to Mozambique, in spite of the Nkomati accord, which the South African Government signed in good faith with Mozambique. If he wishes to come closer to home, let him look at the Coventry Four. Four self-confessed representatives of the Armscor were indicted in this country. The first secretary of the South African Government, Mr. Pelzer, went to a High Court judge and pledged the full faith of the South African Government that they would return those four to this country for trial if they were allowed bail to return to South Africa. They returned to South Africa and then, of course, they said that they would not return to this country.

In the light of those clear examples of South African duplicity, will the Foreign Secretary accept something less than the release of Nelson Mandela before he embarks upon further measures or sanctions, call them what one will? Our fear is that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, decent man as he is, will return from his lonely odyssey brandishing a piece of paper saying, "Peace in our time." That would be greeted with derision in the world, and by the EEC and certainly by the Commonwealth.

Recently, the Prime Minister said that it was a pity that South Africa was no longer a member of the Commonwealth. Might it not be that her motive for saying that was that she was seeking to find at least one friend in the Commonwealth? The South African Broadcasting Corporation commended the Prime Minister for standing up against the mob. Does it thrill the Foreign Secretary as he embarks on his own safari that she has only the commendation of the state South African Broadcasting Corporation?

It is difficult to see how any reasonable individuals can dissent from these elements in the Opposition motion. Who can deny that there is a constitutional crisis looming, and that the Commonwealth is in danger of breaking up unless there are major moves on the part of the Government? Who can deny, after the failure of the Eminent Persons Group, that there is a danger of change being deferred yet again unless sanctions are imposed? Most sensible Members accept that. We believe that the Foreign Secretary and the Minister of State accept that effective sanctions will have to be imposed. Without them, who can deny that inevitably there will be a bloodbath in southern Africa which will make as naught all our nice calculations about the effect on jobs and on British investments? If that bloodbath comes about, it will sweep aside all our trade and investments in that country.

Since our previous debate, the Foreign Secretary has embarked on his safari. We wish him well. We know that he is a decent individual. But we also know that he is battling against the odds. Hardly had he embarked on the aeroplane before he read Hugo Young's interview with the Prime Minister. Poor Seigfried had no more cruel a stab in the back than the one that the Prime Minister delivered to the Foreign Secretary. The Prime Minister repeated the theme of her concern for the blacks. In effect, she said that she knew their interests better than they do. She repeated her concern for morality, which comes ill from someone who has shown no clear appreciation of the desperate position and repression of the blacks within South Africa.

I take no pleasure in saying this. The Foreign Secretary must know it, and the Prime Minister, too, because she has been told by our own diplomatic missions overseas. Rightly or wrongly, the perception of the Prime Minister among the majority of black leaders is that she is not on their side, that she is fundamentally opposed to their aspirations. She is just not believed when she says that she is against apartheid. Anyone with foresight must realise that the writing is on the wall for white minority government in South Africa. It is wrong for this country to be so closely identified with the old regime in South Africa, and so mistrusted by the emerging forces within that country. Might it not be a good thing for Britain if we were to give some signals of appreciation and sympathy for those emerging forces within South Africa?

Is the Prime Minister preparing for a famous victory, a deal under which Pretoria will promise to dismantle apartheid at some stage in the future, with many qualifications? Will she continue to give President Botha the benefit of every doubt? Is she prepared to ignore the possibility of the Commonwealth breaking up on the rock of her own intransigence in this matter? That has set her apart not only from the Foreign Office and the Ministers in it, but from the sensible majority of her own party.

The Prime Minister may feel passionately on this subject. Can she at least spare a thought for the passion of the families of the thousands of blacks who have been killed in South Africa over the past 18 months? Can she spare a thought for the wives and families of the 4,000 or more blacks and others who have been detained in South Africa, and for those, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) and I saw, at the Delmas treason trial of 22 leading blacks who in any sensible country would be playing a leading part in their own Government? Can the Prime Minister at least spare some of that passion for them or for the wives and families of those who do not know what has happened to their dear ones in South Africa or, indeed, to the blacks and others who are forced to flee their country because of the repression? I say to the Prime Minister that passion in the defence of vice is no virtue.

6.47 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): This short debate is vital to us all. It is vital that the Commonwealth continues to be that important channel of dialogue and debate among countries across the world, regardless of colour or creed. I should like to repeat to the House something that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said only a few day ago, on 11 July:

> "The major objectives of our membership of the Commonwealth remain:
> (i) the maintenance and reinforcement of the continuing strong links at all levels between member states and their peoples;
> (ii) continued support for the Commonwealth as an organisation which can play a constructive and stabilising role in world affairs, notably in promoting democratic principles, international understanding and world peace;
>
> (iii) the development of the association as a unique channel for encouraging co-operation and understanding between the industrialised and developing countries;
> (iv) the maximisation of the political and economic benefits of our Commonwealth membership. — [Official Report, 11 July 1986; Vol. 101, c. 279-80.]

We are told that the Commonwealth is under threat. The Commonwealth has survived many crises. Its unity and strength are based on the very many things that unite us. There are more things that unite than divide us. Those bonds remain and will continue to remain. In the Commonwealth, we are at one in our wish to see an end to apartheid and a rapid and fundamental change in South Africa, for which my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary is working so hard. I do not believe that differences of opinion, which are about means, not ends, can undermine Commonwealth unity. The Commonwealth is too strong for that.

The differences that exist will be discussed fully when the Commonwealth leaders meet next month. I am convinced that they can and will resolve the problems before us in the ways that they will decide. We want the Commonwealth to remain an effective force not only in promoting a solution to the present crisis in South Africa but in every sphere in which its influence is felt and is much needed across this very dangerous world of ours.

That bring me to the importance of my right hon. and learned Friend's mission. The House must remember that the Eminent Persons Group emphasised that the alternative to genuine negotiated settlement in South Africa is chaos, bloodshed and destruction. Faced with that alternative, which we all abhor, I hope that the House will agree that the Governments of the Twelve were not just right but absolutely right in wishing to make every possible effort to break the deadlock and to open the way to negotiations and the suspension of violence. That is a formidable task, requiring great patience and perseverance. On the first leg of this mission, which my right hon. and learned Friend found so valuable in establishing a closer understanding of the issues, we naturally met differences of opinion, but that will always be so. It cannot be right, however, for people in the House to talk down the mission for purely party political reasons. They should seriously ask themselves whether that in any way serves the cause of peaceful change that my right hon. and learned Friend is seeking to achieve.

In today's debate, as expected, there have been comments about divisions and differences, but in the Government there is strength and unity of commitment to do all that we can to bring a speedy end to apartheid and a change to a non-racial, democratic system of government in South Africa. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made clear so many times, we utterly abhor apartheid and we are totally committed to finding the most effective way to achieve the changes that we all want. It is in the achievement of that end that our paths diverge—I think that the House is agreed about the ends. It is in the light of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group report, the work agreed to be reviewed at the August conference and the decisions taken by our European partners on 27 June, that we must examine in detail what might need to be done.

We are still at an early stage. My right hon. and learned Friend has just completed the first leg of what may be a long, very detailed and very intense series of visits. It is absolutely clear that if, at the end of those consultations with the leaders of the Economic Seven, the Commonwealth and the European Community we can reach decisions with the unanimous backing of the European Council, 320 million European people and also the Commonwealth, that will be the way to bring about effective change in South Africa. Without that weight of world opinion and the effective commitment of all those countries to achieve that change, we shall not succeed and people will seek to avoid sanctions for their own selfish purposes. No one in the House or in the country would want that.

We should be looking forward, not underestimating the difficulties, but convinced that talking to the leaders of the economic giants of the world, to the leaders of the Commonwealth and to all who should be involved in the dialogue that we seek to achieve in South Africa is the way ahead and we are determined to carry that process through to the very best outcome that we can achieve.

The Eminent Persons Group report has been quoted. We said in that report that we should promote dialogue in South Africa and the suspension of violence on all sides. We all wish those objectives to be achieved. That is fully accepted, but it is a decision that Heads of Government will be taking in a few weeks' time.

Mr. Healey: The Minister referred approvingly to the Eminent Persons Group. Indeed, she described it as her own report when she said "We said in that report". But the report stated that the failure of the British Government and other Governments so far to impose sanctions had deferred change. The report said that sanctions were necessary to produce change—that is also the view of many Conservatives, including the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) — so will the Minister make it clear that when she says that sanctions will not work without everyone's agreement the Foreign Secretary's purpose is to achieve agreement on sanctions? Otherwise, she is deceiving the House.

Mrs. Chalker: The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) is up to his usual tricks, so eminently displayed in his opening speech. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, in all his efforts in southern Africa, is seeking to find a way forward and to persuade the South African Government that the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and other detainees, the unbanning of the ANC and other political groups and the end of the state of emergency should be achieved in very good time. Otherwise, the matters now being considered by European and Commonwealth leaders and the leaders of the Economic Seven will have to be further considered and a decision arrived at.

A decision that will be effective in bringing about an end to apartheid must be workable. The right hon. Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) put her finger on it when she talked about effective measures and the effect that certain financial decisions already taken have had. Whether they can be pushed further is being discussed and will be further discussed and will no doubt be discussed by my right hon. and learned Friend in Washington on Friday. It is important that there be unified backing for the efforts being made from both European Community and Commonwealth, that we do not concentrate on the views of extremists and that we move to the very thing that we have been seeking—the end of apartheid.

It is impossible to say exactly what could be done and how it could be done in terms of any measures that might have to be considered, but I remind the House of the importance of the positive measures that we are already taking. In addition to the £22 million that we are already giving to the states of southern Africa and to black people in South Africa, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has announced an additional sum of £15 million for education and training for non-white South Africans.

Mr. Anderson: It is spread over five years, so it is only £3 million per year.

Mrs. Chalker: Yes, but £3 million for transport projects in the front-line states is of major importance, as the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) recognised. Those measures will do more to develop the way in which the front-line states and others diversify their markets—something that we have already been working on and shall continue to encourage.

None of the measures being discussed is finite. They have not been decided. We are negotiating with all the leaders whom my right hon. and learned Friend is meeting and seeking to meet to find the best chance of success. We are not committed to or against any of the measures that have been mentioned. My right hon. and learned Friend is engaged on a mission to try to achieve the very progress that all Members of the House claim to wish to achieve—an end to apartheid, the unbanning of the ANC and other groups and the unconditional release of Mandela as well as the lifting of the state of emergency. As my right hon. and learned Friend has said, if his mission cannot achieve that, he would regard agreement on further measures as being likely to be necessary. This is of vital importance for the mission that is going on, and we should remind ourselves that without those efforts we have no chance of persuading the South African Government to move further down the path on which they have started in recent years. The right hon. Member for Clydesdale is absolutely right——

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): I beg to move, That the Question be now put.

Mrs. Chalker: I wish my right hon. and learned Friend every success in his mission, and I am sure that the whole House joins me in that, and will accept the Government's amendment.

Question put, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 33 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House reasserts its commitment to the Commonwealth and the goal of peaceful change in South Africa through negotiation; does not believe that general economic sanctions would help to secure that objective; notes that the Government is committed by the Nassau Accord and the Declaration by the European Council at The Hague on 27th June 1986 to consultations with the Commonwealth, the Community and other allies on further measures which might be needed; and welcomes the efforts of the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in his capacity as President of the Twelve to establish conditions in which negotiations can take place.

Poverty (Elderly Persons)

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.13 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to move,

That this House, noting the Government's niggardly pension increase of 40 pence, the break of the link with earnings which this year has prevented an increase three times higher, the cuts in housing benefit of £450 million, the reductions in public transport and the cuts in community provision, all of which chiefly hit pensioners, and bearing in mind that in seven Conservative years pensions have increased by three per cent. in real terms, while under the previous five Labour years they increased by 20 per cent. in real terms, calls on Her Majesty's Government to give priority to ending poverty among pensioners by reversing the tax hand-outs to the most privileged sections of society.

Our central contention in this debate is that poverty amongst the eldery in Britain today is shamefully high, that it is increasing, and that it desperately needs to be cut. Our contention is not only that the pension increase of 40p, due to be awarded in 12 day's time, is derisory but that the pension, at a mere £38·30 a week for a single person, compares extremely badly with pensions currently provided in other EEC countries and very badly too with the relative value of pensioners' cash allowances in this country in Victorian times, as I shall show.

It is our contention, too, that pensioners' living standards are suffering not only because of the miserable level of the pension but because they depend equally on a range of essential public services and are being dragged down by the cuts across the board in housing benefits, in the availability and cost of buses, in community care provision and in delayed access to hospitals for vital operations such as hip replacements.

I read with incredulity in last Saturday's newspapers that the Secretary of State for Social Services was issuing a call for an increased share of national prosperity for the old, the sick and the poor. I say "with incredulity" because no Government in modern times have done more than this Government to diminish that share. Indeed no Minister has done more to diminish it than the right hon. Gentleman; it is with regret that I note that he is not present this evening to hear me.

The Secretary of State has just completed what he likes to call the biggest review of the welfare state since Beveridge. According to the Government's own figures, the effect will be that 2·25 million pensioners will lose money, three times more than will gain. The average overall effect for all pensioners — again I quote the Government, as I shall do repeatedly in my speech — is a loss of 80p, twice the royal ransom that pensioners will get in a couple of weeks' time.

No fewer than 120,000 pensioners are being handed cuts in excess of £5 a week, which at today's pension levels would be the equivalent of hon. Members having their salaries docked by over £2,000 a year. One wonders how many Tory Members who voted for the Social Security Bill would support the same medicine being handed out to themselves.

All that is minor compared with what the Government did in 1980, the effect of which still continues and will increase, contrary to the Secretary of State's claims. The Government in 1980 took a clear and unequivocal decision not to give pensioners a share in the rising national prosperity. They decided to uprate pensions only in line with price increases and not, as the previous Labour Government had done, in line with earnings. [Interruption.] The hon. Member may laugh, but if he considers the facts which I am about to give the laugh will be on him.

If Labour's formula had been continued, the pension increase paid this month would have been three times greater. That is one important fact. More important, if Labour's formula had not been changed—I have asked an independent source in the Library to produce these figures—the pension for a single person today would be no less than £5·95 per week higher than it is, and the pension for a married couple would be no less than £9·40 higher. Those amounts would apply to every week in 1986.

So far from increasing pensioners' share of the national cake, by that decision alone the Government have knocked off cumulatively £5 billion from pensioners' living standards since 1979. That is over the short period of six years. The Government's decision will continue to operate until it is changed, so over a lifetime, or the next 70 years, the figures of the Government's Actuary show that giving pensioners their share of the rising national income, that is, by paying pensions in line with earnings, would cumulatively put into pensioners' pockets pensions worth £56 billion. Those figures were issued recently by the Government.

By refusing to give pensioners their share of the rising national income, that is, by uprating pensions purely in line with prices, the Government have decided to allocate only £20 billion to pensioners over the same period. Again, that is the Government's own estimate. It really is the most brazen cynicism for the Secretary of State to call for pensioners and others to have their due share of rising national prosperity and then to do—and it is what the Government do that matters—exactly the reverse by reducing pensions by nearly two-thirds below that level over the period of a lifetime.

It is not as though the pension in Britain is exactly generous. I suspect that hon. Ministers and those outside the House——

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): Also it will result in more pensioners having to ask for supplementary benefit as a counter balance.

Mr. Meacher: Of course, and I shall be commenting on that. My hon. Friend has made a very important point. Figures that were issued yesterday show that the number of people on supplementary benefit, including pensioners, has reached an all-time high.

I suspect that most people have little idea of how miserably badly the pension in this country compares with pensions that are now being paid in other European countries. According to the Department's evidence, which was given in a written answer last year, the total state pension amounts to just 27 per cent. of average earnings in Britain. In Germany it is 50 per cent.; in Belgium it is 60 per cent.; in France it is 60 to 70 per cent. Therefore, by international standards the pension in this country is pathetically inadequate. If other countries can pay a significantly higher pension, why cannot we? That question has never been satisfactorily answered by the Government.

It is not only by international comparisons that it can be seen that today our pensioners are getting such a raw deal. It is also by comparison with what happened in the past in this country. I am sure that most hon. Members will agree that poverty is not an absolute; it is relative to the average standard of living in society at any time. By that standard, pensioners today are somewhat worse off —I say advisedly "worse off"—than their forebears who received the first state old-age pension in the early years of this century.

It may seem remarkable to the House, but it is true, that they are much worse off — by comparison with the average worker, which is the relevant comparison—than those elderly persons who received the poor law allowances in the middle of the last century. Those allowances than amounted to roughly two-thirds or more of the income of an adult worker. Today the elderly are allotted little more than one-third of the income of the average adult worker.

We hear a great deal from the Prime Minister about Victorian values whenever she wants to exhort us to be thrifty. If she really believes in such values, she ought to apply them to her treatment of pensioners. If she did, it would mean a dramatic reversal of everything that she has done over pensions during the past seven years.

Unlike the Government, the Opposition believe that at present pensioners receive a shameful return after a lifetime of service to this country. We believe that widespread poverty in old age is an indictment of our society and that it should be removed. We believe that pensioners should be given a full share in rising national prosperity. It was precisely for those reasons that the last Labour Government increased pensions in line with earnings each year, with the result that the value of the pension rose 20 per cent. in real terms during the five years of the last Labour Government, compared with a mere 3 to 4 per cent. during the last seven years of this Government. It was precisely for those same reasons that the last Labour Government introduced the state earnings-related pension scheme, which uniquely offers a high road out of poverty in old age and at last begins to put this country on a par with what other European countries already do for their pensioners. Yet it is upon this high road that this Government are now insisting on imposing a road block.

In the current Social Security Bill, the build-up of SERPS, which would have taken virtually all pensioners well above the supplementary benefit poverty line without a means test, is being stopped in its tracks. The latest report of the Government Actuary shows that the cutbacks in SERPS will amount to no less than £19 billion in the middle of the next century. That is the amount which the Government are proposing over that period to take away from pensioners.

These figures, huge though they are, may still not convey the full enormity of what the Government are doing to pensioners. Therefore, I put down a question in which I asked what would be the combined effect on the ordinary pension of the two major structural changes that this Government have made in the state pension: the chopping back of SERPS and the uprating in line with prices only. I received a written answer, which Members can look up, if they wish, on 6 February 1986. It showed that a young man who starts work in 1988 when the current Social Security Bill is intended to come into operation will end up with a combined basic and SERPS pension that is worth only £64 a week at 1985 prices. By comparison, if Labour's policy were pursued of uprating pensions in line with earnings and retaining SERPS in its present form, the written answer shows that he would receive a pension of exactly twice as much — £128 a week, again at 1985 prices.

That is the real case against the Government. It is not just a question of this cut or that cut here and now—although that is bad enough. It is the fundamental structural attack which this Government have launched on the position of pensioners in society which will drastically affect every single person in this country—not just those who are now retired but also middle-aged workers, young workers and those who are still at school. Indeed, the younger they are, the more it will affect them. For every person in this country the knives are out. They will hack back the state pension to which people can look forward by up to a half.

The gist of our case is that the framework of decent pensions above the poverty line is being dismantled. But the picture in the short term is not very different. Pensioners are being hit here and now by the huge £450 million cut in housing benefit. They were robbed of £550 million when the Government changed from a forecasting to a historic basis for uprating. They lost another £86 million when the Government increased the available scale margin, thus hitting the poorest pensioners on supplementary benefit who were receiving heating allowances.

Another £50 million is now being taken away from pensioners because of the Government's increase in the rates taper for housing benefit and their abolition of central heating additions for supplementary benefit claimants. Soon, if the Lords amendments are reversed, the poorest pensioners on supplementary benefit will be forced to pay 20 per cent. of their rates. That must inevitably force them below the poverty line. It will be the first time that any Government have ever done that. Over the next quarter of a century, widows — the great majority of whom will be pensioners—according to the Government's own figures that they have just released, will be deprived of £12 million, because of the cuts in widows' benefits that will arise from the Social Security Bill.

To compensate for all of that, in a couple of weeks time pensioners are to be treated to a bonanza rise of 40p. If that is not offensive enough, let me add that the next pensions increase will not be much bigger. The Secretary of State will announce it in October, which happens to be the month of the big bang. That is the nickname for financial deregulation in the City, but one might be excused for thinking that it referred to the explosive escalation of salaries in the City.

There is something ineradicably repellent yet irrefutably characteristic about this Government that in the same month that the Prime Minister's friends in the City—her people — will be popping the champagne corks to celebrate their six-figure pay packets, the Secretary of State will unveil the next pension increase, which I predict will be about 80p. So much for caring capitalism. So much for the Prime Minister's policy for the family. So much for giving pensioners a share in rising national prosperity. Frankly, I am amazed that the Prime Minister and her colleagues do not choke on the nausea of their cynicism.

Nor is there any compensation when we consider the social wage. Rather, the reverse is the case. The social wage is very important and good public services are an essential part of the livelihood of most pensioners. Pensioners, perhaps more than any other group in the population, have been the main victims of the steady erosion of public service provision over the past several years. Cuts in bus routes and the higher costs of fares under the Transport Bill must severely reduce pensioners' mobility. No doubt that will leave many pensioners little more than prisoners in their home area.

Reductions in home helps, meals on wheels, day centres, chiropody services, and the lack of respite for carers looking after the frail, confused or disabled elderly are all diminishing the quality of life for hundreds of thousands of pensioners. The lengthening waiting lists in many areas for crucial operations such as hip replacements leave thousands of pensioners not just in discomfort—although that is bad enough—but in intense pain for months at a time.

We reject a system with such priorities. We reject the system which gives a pittance of an increase on a pittance of a pension, while at the same time the Top Salaries Review Body awards an increase of nearly £50 a week to top civil servants, judges and military personnel. We reject a system which allowed 1,000 elderly people to die of hypothermia last year while the bungled bureaucratic farce of exceptionally severe weather payments denied help to pensioners even when the temperature was below zero. Above all, we reject a system and a Government which, according to the written answer issued yesterday, drives up the number in poverty to 5,250,000 claimants, the highest level ever recorded in Britain. That means that there are now officially more than 8 million people—one in seven of the population—living on or below the poverty line in Britain today. Of course, a high proportion are pensioners.

Instead of that, we propose a charter of justice for pensioners. As a priority, we will raise the single person's pension by £5 a week and the married couple's pension by £8 a week. That will broadly compensate pensioners for what they have lost during the Tory years by the break in the earnings link. We will pay for that and for a £3 a week increase in child benefit by taking back the tax handouts now totalling over £3·5 billion a year which have been poured out on the richest 5 per cent. of the population —the Prime Minister's own people—in honour of her zealous vision of growing inequality.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Can the hon. Gentleman tell us how many years on the trot the Labour party intends to offer the £5 and £8 increase? Will they, as they did in 1974, give a substantial increase made on a promise which won the election in the first year and then take it back in the following year?

Mr. Meacher: We will continue to pay those sums for every year that we remain in government. I do not think it is surprising that, having made that change, we will maintain that change in the order book. Each year, the £3·5 billion which the richest 5 per cent. would have received will go to pensioners, mothers with young children and to the long-term unemployed. A little will still be left over for the severely and very severely handicapped. That is a policy of social justice which I believe the people will strongly support.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): Before the hon. Gentleman goes too far with his £3·6 billion clawback in tax from high income earners, may I ask him whether he is aware that the promises that he has made amount to a cost per annum not of £3·6 billion but, on reasonable assumptions, of £5·6 billion?

Mr. Meacher: That figure is as fabricated as the £24 billion which the Government like to prate about on every occasion.

Mr. Major rose——

Mr. Meacher: The Minister will have an opportunity to make his speech. I want to make it clear that the main item in that £24 billion is £3 billion which is allotted to the reduction of the pension age to a common age of 60. I have not said that, the Labour party has not said that and it is not party policy that the age will be reduced to 60. Yet it appears as the biggest single item in the Government's list. That is typical of the moonshine represented by these allegations.

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman is being inaccurate. However, rather than take up too much of his time, I shall be happy later—if I catch Mr. Speaker's eye—to set out in some detail the costings of the hon. Gentleman's promise.

Mr. Meacher: I should be delighted if the Minister were to do that. I hope that the costings will be more accurate than some of the allegations made earlier in the year. I remind the Minister—as he probably needs reminding—that the figures which I have quoted have been worked out on the basis of Treasury written answers and answers from the DHSS. I stand precisley by the figures that I have given because they are correct.

We will also restore the link with earnings because we believe that pensioners should fully share in rising national prosperity. We will retain SERPS, which is perfectly affordable because it offers pensioners the best deal that they have ever had and because SERPS will finally end the cruel indignity of means-tested poverty in old age.

We will tackle the horror of hypothermia by a new winter fuel premium of £5 a week for the coldest months from December to March. We will make the steady build-up of community care services, which are so vital to the well-being of the aged, one of the priorities for a renewed Health Service.

I do not deny that this is an ambitious programme but it is also a rigorously costed and practical programme. I believe that the vast majority of the British people will endorse it. Taken against the miserable and niggardly record on pensions over the past seven years, I believe that that programme will shortly play a major part in finally sweeping the Government from power.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'congratulates Her Majesty's Government on its achievement in increasing the purchasing power of the national insurance retirement pension during a period when the number of pensioners has risen by nearly a million; endorses the Government's firm commitment fully to protect pensioners against rising prices; welcomes the continued development of health and community services for the elderly; recognises the Government's outstanding success in reducing the rise in prices to the lowest level for nearly twenty years; and notes that security in retirement would be the first casualty of the renewed and rapid inflation which would flow from the expenditure and taxation policies advocated by Her Majesty's Opposition.'

In moving the amendment, I want first to set out clearly and in less heated but more factual terms than those used by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) what the Government have achieved in relation to pensions.

When we came to office in 1979, the national insurance retirement pension for a married couple stood at the rate set in November 1978—£19·50 a week. In less than a fortnight's time, with the uprating which takes place on 28 July, it will have been increased to £38·70 a week. That is an increase of £19·20 in cash terms, and of only just short of 100 per cent. in percentage terms. It compares with a rise in prices of several points less over the same period. Pensioners have therefore had a real increase in their standard of living—as indeed even the hon. Gentleman's motion has the grace to acknowledge. The fact is that we have more than kept faith with the clear promise we made—and continue to make, and will continue to fulfil—fully to protect the retirement pension against the rise in prices. What is more, we are doing so on the basis of clear facts about what that rise has actually been, not on the basis of the previous Government's hit-or-miss forecasts that turned out wrong five times out of seven.

Nor have those increases been achieved as a matter of easy routine. They have been made against a difficult economic background. And they have been made not only for the 8·5 million pensioners who existed in 1979, but for a number which has grown in the intervening period by nearly a million to the 9·5 million pensioners we have today. In other words, we are now paying better pensions than ever before, and to more pensioners than ever before. As always, the hon. Member for Oldham, West goes on about "cuts". It is his most frequently used word. There is no cut here. Spending on pensions has increased from £7·5 billion in 1978-79 to £16·5 billion in 1985-86. Of course, some of that increased spending is the consequence of inflation, albeit at the greatly reduced rate which has been not the least of the Government's successes, but much of it is not just the consequence of inflation. For example, £2·5 billion represents a real increase in the value of the resources that we devote to the state retirement pension, and of that, £1·5 billion represents the real increase in the purchasing power of pensions.

If the hon. Gentleman really wants, as he obviously does because he does little else, to talk about cuts perhaps he would tell us about the Christmas bonus and explain to the House why the Government of whom he was a member simply refused to pay it for two of the five Christmases during which they were in office.

Mr. Meacher: Piffling.

Mr. Newton: The Christmas bonus is piffling? Is that official Labour policy? Will that lead to the cancellation of the bonus under any future Labour Government?

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): The Labour Government may not have paid the bonus, and it was wrong not to do so, but the Minister is talking about an amount of £20. When will he restore the money that he has taken from pensioners during the past seven years?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman may not think that £20 is much money, but one matter that the House must judge, in considering the words of the hon. Member for Oldham, West about what he would do if he got the chance, is what he did when he had the chance. When he was a Minister in the DHSS he did not pay the Christmas bonus. The present Government have made the bonus a clear annual entitlement under the law.

Mr. Meacher: I was saying that it is a piffling point to refer to the fact that for two years the Christmas bonus was not paid. That is £20 less than pensioners might otherwise have got. Will the Minister tell us the value of a 20 per cent. real increase, multiplied by every week for five years, because that is the amount by which it was increased? It is hundreds of times more than the piffling amount to which he constantly refers.

Mr. Newton: It does not seem to me to be piffling or trivial to observe, when listening to the promises that the hon. Gentleman now so relentlessly makes whenever he gets the opportunity, that some regard should be paid to what he did when he had the chance to act. In effect, he cheated the old-age pensioners of their Christmas bonus two Christmases out of five.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I am most interested in following the Minister's observations. He has waxed eloquent about the loss of £20 in five years. Will he comment on the £570 that the pensioner couple has lost and the £390 that the single pensioner has lost since 1981 under the Government's cuts?

Mr. Newton: Yes, I would. I should like to comment on them in the following way, because it is the other great deficiency in the credibility of the hon. Gentleman, and slightly less in the case of the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), because she was at least cutting expenditure in another Department during the period of office of the Labour Government. The hon. Gentleman will remember clearly, because he was in the Department under the Labour Government, that when it came to the crunch of fulfilling all of those promises about increases related to earnings, after the International Monetary Fund had become involved in 1976 and 1977, the then Secretary of State for Social Services invented a dodge to change the uprating method which had the effect of taking £1,000 million in a full year from pensioners, measured by today's value of pensions.

The hon. Gentleman will have heard from me before —I do not wish to weary him too much—that that was when, as we all know, the celebrated story appeared in The Times on 11 March 1976 of how the hon. Gentleman had attended a pensioners' rally arranged by his brotherly loving friends in the Trades Union Congress and was shouted down as he tried to explain the Government's record on pensions. That is what happened when the hon. Gentleman had the opportunity to take responsibility for those matters. Alongside those broad measures which benefit all pensioners, we have made many other important improvements for some groups.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): One of the most welcome defeats inflicted upon the Social Security Bill in the other place concerning pensions was the rejection of the 20 per cent. domestic rates contribution. As the matter is of special importance to Scottish pensioners vis-à-vis the recent revaluation exercise inflicted upon pensioners by the Government, what is the likelihood of the measure being reintroduced by the Government next week when the Bill returns to the House?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the consideration of the Bill in the other place is not yet completed. It would be inappropriate for me to respond to his question until it has been completed. I shall not disguise from him the fact that the Government still firmly believe that it is important to improve the accountability of local authorities to their electorates and to impose that through the social security system.

That is my description of the broad achievements of the Government in relation to the national insurance pension. Of course, there has been a range of other improvements, some of them admittedly only important to small but nevertheless important groups of people, which should not be forgotten when the House debates retirement pensions. For example, we have taken steps to ensure that a married woman over 80 who qualified for a non-contributory pension gets it at a full rate, not a reduced one. We have also relaxed the residence rule for those non-contributory over-80s pensions, in such a way as to enable people who return to Britain after the age of 70 to qualify, whereas under the previous regime they could never have got such a pension.

Although that is a small point, I take special pleasure in it, since I well recall trying to persuade the Labour Government to do almost exactly that in a Social Security Bill Standing Committee of which I was a member in 1978, only to have my proposal strongly resisted by the then Labour Minister for Social Security.

More importantly, we have abolished the remaining effects of the old half-test for married women which we inherited from the Labour Government and which prevented many married women from receiving their pension in return for the contributions that they had made. That measure alone enables 20,000 people — married women who reached the age of 60 before 1979 — to receive pensions on those contributions that they would not otherwise have had.

Nor, despite the hon. Gentleman's attempt to say so, have we forgotten those pensioners who are least well-off and on supplementary pensions. We have increased their pensions, too, in real terms. The rules about capital have been eased to help those with limited savings. Extra help with heating costs has been substantially increased since we took office and extended so that many more pensioners and more than 90 per cent. of pensioners on supplementary benefit receive such an addition with a higher rate for the over-85s. We have, of course, made it clear that the spending on heating additions will become part of the new scheme and will be taken into account in setting the new premium rates of income support for pensioners.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Newton: There are many hon. Members who wish to speak, and I am in danger of taking too much time. I have already given way many times and it is right, from the point of view of the entire House, that I should continue. However, I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the Minister accept that last winter, during the period of exceptionally cold weather, many elderly people needed extra assistance but could not obtain it because of the byzantine complexity and the lack of public understanding about the additional help that should be made available and potentially is available? Does he accept that something must be done before next winter to ensure that elderly people do not die from cold?

Mr. Newton: I have made it entirely clear that neither the Government nor anybody else is satisfied with the way in which that regulation has worked during the last two winters. We have been considering that matter and I hope that it will not be too long before I can give some idea of our intentions, although I cannot do so tonight.

As I have told the House before when discussing the Government's record on pensions, we need not apologise for that record. It is one in which we can, and do, take pride. That pride is in no way affected by the fact that, largely because of the Government's success in cutting inflation, the actual amount of this July's pension increase is modest by the standards of the Labour days when large increases were needed just to stand still. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said on a previous occasion, the one ambition of the hon. Member for Oldham, West seems to be to return to the days of 20 per cent. inflation so that he can then claim credit for 20 per cent. pension increases, and completely ignore the hardship caused by that inflation.

Much of the hon. Gentleman's speech was nothing more than a re-run of his speech in the debate on the uprating orders a month ago. As the hon. Gentleman has re-run his speech, I shall remind the House of my comments on that occasion. The pension increases that will come into effect in a fortnight are four months earlier than usual and, when taken with last November's increase, will mean that the pension for a married couple will be increased by £4·65 a week in less than a year. There will be another increase only eight months later, resulting in three increases in a period that would normally have seen two.

The hon. Gentleman relentlessly runs away from the fact that those increases are coupled with greater price stability than we have seen for decades, and that is probably the biggest single bonus that pensioners have had in 20 or 30 years. That helps to give us a more sensible framework for future increases and is fully in line, as have been all our actions, with our firm and continuing commitment to maintain the value of the pension.

The hon. Gentleman concentrated almost exclusively on social security, despite the fact that his motion refers rather more widely to aspects of health and personal social services as well. I should like to comment on that because it is of great importance to our retired population. It is an area in which any Government will face a significant challenge over the coming decades, and well into the next century. Total expenditure on social services has increased from a little over £1 billion in 1978-79 to nearly £2·5 billion in 1985-86, a real increase of over 20 per cent. A growing proportion of that increase relates to the elderly.

The hon. Gentleman made some play of a number of statistics relating to social services. I shall give him just one to digest while he considers the rest of the debate. Everybody would accept that day centres are an important part of our provision for the elderly. There are now 39,700 places, representing an increase of 31·5 per cent. since 1978. That is the kind of provision which we are seeking to stimulate and encourage as part of an overall greater flexibility and diversity in the provision of care.

Mrs. Beckett: Since the Minister said that he wanted to give the House as much information as possible, will he now tell us how much of that was spent by Labour-controlled local authorities who have continually been criticised and rate capped by the Government as a result?

Mr. Newton: The Government have consistently sought to encourage all local authorities to make better use of the money they spend on social services, and to give greater priority to the needs of groups such as the elderly. That policy and the Government's encouragement are reflected in what is happening.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Is the Minister aware that last year the Department of the Environment informed 30 of the 32 London boroughs that their social services budget was over the grant-related expenditure allocation formula, and that a significant number, I think half, were over the target figure as well, specifically on social services, which means, in effect, that the Government were telling those authorities to cut back on their social services provision, much of which was for the elderly?

Mr. Newton: If the hon. Gentleman examines some of the work of the Audit Commission and others, he will know just how many of those London boroughs could deliver a great deal more service for the same amount of money, as has been demonstrated by local authorities up and down the country.

I am anxious to allow other hon. Members to contribute to the debate, but I should also like to comment on National Health Service expenditure which has risen by some 25 per cent. in real terms, in respect of people aged 65 and over between 1978-79 and 1984-85. Those increases have meant that, despite the rising population of people over retirement age, expenditure per head rose by some 19 per cent. over that period. This in turn has been reflected in the services available to them.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West referred to hip operations. The number of hip replacements, 75 per cent. of which are performed on elderly people, rose from just over 28,000 to well over 37,000 in that period and a similar pattern is true of other operations which are of particular importance to elderly people.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I put this point gently because the problem is difficult. It relates to dental care. The Minister will be aware of the representations of the General Dental Practitioners Association and of the problems encountered by many hon. Members in their constituencies. On visiting the dentist, some, but not all, elderly people find that the charges are rather high, up to £115. Is it not an anomaly that charges should be made for X-rays of the mouth in cases where elderly people do not have to pay for X-rays of other parts of the body? There are other anomalies, but all I am asking is that the Department of Health and Social Security should study the problem and comment on it. I see the Secretary of State nodding. I think that he recognises that this is a real problem.

Mr. Newton: I heard my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State murmur "Certainly" just as the hon. Gentleman saw him nodding and we shall, of course, look at the points he raised. I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will make any comment that he can at the end of the debate, but it may well be more appropriate for us to write to the hon. Gentleman on this matter.

Before I conclude, I should like to comment on the promises and estimates made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West on which he was challenged by my hon. Friend. I will give the hon. Gentleman the figures that we have put on the promises that he has made and repeated today. For the promises that he has made about increasing retirement pension and supplementary pension, assuming he intends to adjust the housing benefit needs allowances——

Mr. Meacher: Oh!

Mr. Newton: Let me run through my figures. It is going to be very interesting indeed. I shall give my figures and we shall then see what interesting gloss the hon. Gentleman wishes to put on them. The pension increases which he has just repeated, and to adjust the housing benefit needs allowances in line, would cost £2·2 billion. It will cost £1·85 billion to increase child benefit by £3, along with supplementary benefit and housing benefit needs allowances for families with children, to ensure that they too benefit from the increase. To pay the long-term scale rate for people who are unemployed for more than one year would cost £540 million. This makes a total of £4·6 billion as distinct from the £3·6 billion mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

We have also assumed that, in line with the policies of successive Governments over many years, he would also wish to raise other long-term national insurance benefits, for example, widows' benefit, to which he referred in such loving terms, and invalidity benefit which for people between 65 and 70 years of age is, in some circumstances, virtually an alternative to retirement pension.

Mr. Raynsford Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Newton: No, let me finish.

We have also assumed that the hon. Gentleman would raise the supplementary allowance long-term scale rate and avoid offsetting savings in supplementary benefit for widowed mothers and people on invalidity benefit, and that housing benefit needs allowances would also have to be increased. That is how we reach the total of £5·6 billion. I should be fascinated to hear—indeed, I should like to hear it now—whether the real meaning of those large and apparently generous promises is that the poorest people, in respect of housing benefit needs allowances and supplementary benefit, whether they are pensioners, families with children, the long-term unemployed, widows or those on invalidity benefit, are to get no benefit from the hon. Gentleman's promises. Because on the £3·6 billion, every penny, as far as I can judge, will be clawed back from the poorest social security beneficiaries. Is that the policy?

Mr. Raynsford rose——

Hon Members: Answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker). Order. I thought that the Minister was giving way to the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford). I hope that he will make clear to whom he is giving way.

Mr. Newton: I was giving way to the hon. Member for Oldham, West in order that he should make clear his policy. If the hon. Gentleman does not wish to intervene to tell me what his policy is in a way which clarifies the matter, I see no reason for giving way to any more of his hon. Friends at this stage of the debate.

Mr. Raynsford rose——

Mr. Newton: No, I shall not give way.

We now know either that the promises of the hon. Member for Oldham, West mean nothing for the poorest people on social security benefits, or that they would cost a great deal more than the money he can get from the so-called wealthy taxpayers, in which case we want to know where the rest of the money is coming from. Which ordinary taxpayers, which VAT rate, which other forms of taxation will be raised to achieve the hon. Gentleman's objectives?

Mr. Raynsford rose——

Mr. Newton: No, I shall not give way.

The House must recognise that the promises of the hon. Member for Oldham, West—whatever they turn out to be—must be set against Labour's record. I have already referred to the Christmas bonus fiddle and the uprating fiddle of the Labour Government. The invalid care allowance, which this Government are now extending to married women, was introduced on a discriminatory anti-married woman basis by the Labour Government of which the hon. Gentleman was a member.

In 1977-78 the NHS budget was cut by 3 per cent. in real terms—the only time that that has happened in recorded history. In 1978-79 capital spending on hospitals in Great Britain was reduced to £436 million, which compares with well over £1 billion available now for spending on new facilities for pensioners in the NHS.

Lastly, I make the point about the dog that has not barked in this debate. It is clear from everything that the hon. Gentleman has said that the target for this debate is not the relatively few Members of Parliament assembled here this evening; it is the electors of Newcastle-under-Lyme tomorrow. I just wonder why it is that the dog that has not barked is the Bradwell geriatric hospital in the Newcastle-under-Lyme constituency. That is a £5 million development for the very elderly people who are the subject of the debate. That was cut by Labour and dropped from the capital programme when that programme was cut by one third in 1976-77. That programme has been restored by this Government. The hospital is now being built and will open at the end of next year. The reality against which the hon. Gentleman's promises have to be measured is the cuts of the Labour Government and the building programme of this one.

In the previous debate that we had on these matters about a month ago, I predicted that if the hon. Gentleman were let loose to spend as he promises we should have back the surging inflation that marked the previous Labour Government, with all the hardship that that meant for pensioners in Britain. Today I shall venture another prediction. If the hon. Gentleman were to achieve what no doubt is his heart's desire, and became the Secretary of State for Social Services, he would not last six months. It would simply become too embarrassing for his colleagues to listen to him speaking at the Government Dispatch Box, eating all the words that he had uttered at the Opposition Dispatch Box. I invite the Houes to reject the motion, to accept the amendment, and to help save the hon. Gentleman from that embarrassment.

8.5 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): The mark of a society that is in some difficulty and, indeed, in some danger is one that does not offer decent prospects to young people nor a fair chance of security to the old. Despite the side of the House on which hon. Members may sit, they will have to agree that two of the biggest social problems that Britain has at the moment are the lack of opportunity for the young and the sense of insecurity for the elderly. Ministers are not doing themselves or their case, far less the issue at stake, much good by trying to pretend that there are no problems, conflicts or competing priorities to be faced. In that respect, I found the Minister's speech, entertaining though it was in its analysis of the Labour party's economic policies—an analysis with which I would concur—disappointing in that it did not seek to address some of the serious and genuine problems that exist.

It was interesting that in April 1985 a public opinion poll carried out by MORI showed that 69 per cent. of people, when asked, believed the basic state pension to be too low. I hardly think that in the wake of a 40p increase that percentage of people expressing dissatisfaction with the level of the basic pension is liable to have dropped. I should have thought that one could say clearly that at least three quarters of the population would like to see a higher basic pension.

If we want that, the Minister, in putting forward his case, is right to stress that at the end of the day that can only be based on a sound economic policy. I agree that simply to run a highly inflationary economic policy and then to claim some credit for increasing a basic pension rate in line with high levels of inflation is nothing to be proud of. His analysis is correct.

Therefore, I hope that the Minister will admit that in the case that has been put forward by my right hon. Friends and myself over the past few years at each Budget time, in marked contrast to the Labour party, we have produced a costed economic programme and have admitted where our spending priorities would have to be met by specific increases in certain areas, or that certain things that we would like to do as a point of principle cannot be achieved in the immediate future because the money would not be there to do so. I hope that the Minister will be fair-minded enough to recognise the difference of approach which exists between the Labour party and ourselves in putting forward those kinds of social priorities.

So it has been with pensions.

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): I am deeply appreciative that the hon. Gentleman has given way. He is right in saying that the Benches that he represents have a policy which is costed. Would he be so kind as to inform the House of the increase that he would make, particularly as we now know the position of the Opposition?

Mr. Kennedy: If the hon. Gentleman reads the programme for government which we presented at the last general election, and subsequent policy statements—and a further statement which we shall make in the autumn, although I cannot anticipate its contents—he will find that we propose that a married couple with no private pension or other income would receive a basic pension of £63·25. We also propose a scheme of pensioner credit, which would provide an additional £5·72. The total of £68·95 should be compared with the Government's proposed £61·30. Moreover, pensioners' housing costs would be met. Even if the pennies change between now and the autumn, the change would mean that a pensioner's income would be substantially above supplementary benefit rates.

At the last general election and since, when we have introduced private Members' Bills, my right hon. and hon. Friends have tried to abolish standing charges. We have allowed for that in our figures. That would be welcomed in various parts of the House and in the country.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the last time two Bills which would have abolished standing charges, one of which was mine on pensioners' rights to heat, light and communications, were presented, the hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury), a member of the Sainsbury family, opposed them on behalf of the Government and thus prevented this important matter from being debated?

Mr. Kennedy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing that to our attention. I am glad that it is on record. It will be interesting to read the Official Report tomorrow to see whether it remains on the record. I am sure that he will make strenuous efforts to ensure that it is. It is important to be aware that, when there has been opposition, it has come from the Government.

In the social security reviews, the Government are displaying supreme insensitivity in regard to the death grant, which is an important matter for many elderly people. The Government now suggest that the grant, which is woefully low—low enough to be a poor joke—is to be abolished and that some means, as yet rather ill-defined, will be established to provide support through the social fund. Subjecting elderly people at a time of bereavement to some regionally cash-limited, means-tested interview procedure is callous. Our policy document on this matter suggests that the death grant should be increased immediately to £250, and that it should be reclaimable out of the estate of the deceased according to its size.

Our Budget statement in March made it clear that we would restore the deplorable cut in heating allowances. As the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) said, it is scandalous to suggest that pensioners should contribute 20 per cent. of their rates. It is clear that there are to be real cuts in housing benefit. Despite the Minister's robust defence of the social security reviews, it is worth noting the conclusion reached by the Institute for Fiscal Studies, which said:

"the reviews imply a significant shift of resources from pensioners to the working age population, half of all pensioners are more than 1 per cent. worse off and 11 per cent. have their incomes reduced by more than 5 per cent. The net effect is a transfer of £300 million".

I should like Ministers to attack those figures as well briefed and with the same enthusiasm with which they attack the figures advanced by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). The Government seem considerably more reticent to attack a detailed and independent analysis by such groups than they are to attack their political opponents. We are left wondering why. We, and perhaps Ministers in their hearts, know that independent analyses reveal the disturbing truth.

Dr. Godman: I am listening closely to what an alliance Government would provide for pensioners. The hon. Gentleman mentioned heating additions. I do not know about his experience in the part of Scotland which he represents, but in Strathclyde there have been many complaints about exceptionally severe weather payments for February. I know that many scores of thousands of payments were made in Scotland and, presumably, a goodly number were made to pensioners. What is the hon. Gentleman's answer to that dreadful state of affairs?

Mr. Kennedy: As I said earlier, we must try to assist at the outset by giving a more substantial basic pension to help people to heat their homes. We must recognise that such additional payments will be made, however, and I suspect that the hon. Gentleman and I agree that the system is botched and chaotic. I have heard from people who work in the DHSS that, much as they want to help, they are furious when the Minister of State, in response to political pressure here, goes on television to say that the Government have fixed it because he has issued a blanket instruction that such payments must be made. People who work in the DHSS are then deluged with applications from pensioners. They cannot cope and, in July, they are still working on the backlog.

The Government have made more people dependent on social security benefits and added to poverty. They have also cut the number of DHSS staff. Even the best system in the world will not operate properly if there are insufficient people to administer it. We must make the system better and increase the number of personnel to make it operate better. I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that that would be a step in the right direction, and better than what the Government offer.

I do not know to what extent the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State reads reports of the Scottish Grand Committee.

Mr. Major: Daily.

Mr. Kennedy: Jeffrey Archer clearly has competition when it comes to the Minister's bedside reading. The Scottish Grand Committee recently had a debate on the Scottish Office proposal to reform the rating system in Scotland. I do not intend to get into that horrendously complicated issue, but my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) made a valid point concerning the 20 per cent. rate contribution. Apparently, we face that prospect in Scotland much sooner than people south of the border. We asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how he would accommodate that fact and what form the system would take in Scotland in the transition towards the community charge——

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): The poll tax.

Mr. Kennedy: Indeed. The community charge is Saachi and Saachi's description of a poll tax. The Secretary of State for Scotland said that it is not his responsibility because it comes under the social security reviews which are being handled by the DHSS. The Minister will appreciate that Scottish Members have been told by the Secretary of State that, although he is getting rid of rates, it is not his problem that some way has to be found to collect the 20 per cent. contribution. We have never had, from the DHSS or from the Scottish Office, an adequate description of what will happen in Scotland in the transitional phase and thereafter. I would be grateful if he could give some indication tonight because many hon. Members would be extremely interested to find out what the Government propose to do. My strong hunch is that the Government do not have the faintest idea what to do about the problem. Judging by the rather guilty grin on the Minister's face, I suspect that that is an accurate assumption. We shall listen with interest, and I hope that he can satisfy us better than did his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

We tend to think of the pensioner being cared for. We must also remember those pensioners who are perhaps parents of handicapped children and who are having to look after them. We must also think of pensioners who have to look after very aged parents, perhaps in their late 80s or early 90s. We all know the effect of that because we see it in our communities. More often than not, it is the person doing the caring who ends up falling ill or dying as a result of the strain. That being the case, it would be good to see the Government move in the direction proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), myself and my colleagues of introducing a carers' charter which would seek to give those who care informally for dependent or handicapped relatives or whoever in the community, not just a level of support through a carer's benefit, but some form of agreement with local authorities so that relief facilities can be provided to give the carer a much-needed break.

Unfortunately, although the Government paid considerable lip service to the private Member's Bill dealing with services and representation for disabled people, they did not move very far down the line in practical support.

I said at the beginning that in this country we are not caring adequately in terms of opportunities for the young or security for the old. Tonight we are debating the elderly. One of the things which must give the elderly the greatest cause for insecurity, with perhaps the single exception of the degree of violence in Britain, must be the fact that there is increasingly a glaring hole in the level of network support in the community to make care in the community the viable and realistic option that we all want it to be. That is coming about as a result of the complete distortion and lack of matching of Government policies. The Scottish Home and Health Department and the DHSS are encouraging care in the community, and the Department of the Environment and the Scottish Office have policies for local government finance which are deliberately or directly thwarting that by the level to which they are pulling back on the resources which could be available.

Until that border problem begins to be tackled, I fear, despite the enthusiasm with which the Minister criticises his direct political opponent, the hon. Member for Oldham, West, across the Dispatch Box, the truth will be shown, not just in a certain constituency that goes to the polls tomorrow, but all over the country, that the lot for pensioners in this country under the Government is not something that the Minister should crow about to the extent that he did tonight. I believe that the policies put forward by my right hon. and hon. Friends will, when put into practice, I hope by ourselves in government, prove a much better way forward.

8.25 pm

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): In taking part in this debate I feel, as a matter of honour, that I should declare that for the past seven years I have represented 95,000 old-age pensioners at national level. Having said that, I hold the view, and I have held it over many years, that the greatest blessing that any Government of any persuasion can give to the sick, aged, infirm, unemployed, pensioners and those on fixed incomes is low inflation. The blessing that is being experienced at the moment with the level of inflation is something that the House, across all political divides, should applaud.

I went into the general election in 1983, like all Conservative Members, with a firm pledge that we would protect the retirement pension. I address the House this evening with a great sense of confidence that we have honoured that manifesto pledge to the letter.

I am a little surprised and disappointed that we have had so much debate regarding the heating costs. It is a simple, plain and unchallengeable fact that the allowances for heating are running at record levels. However, I must take account of the comments made by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) regarding the administration. It was a source of considerable pleasure, not only to people in the House, but to pensioners at large, to hear the assurance from the Government Front Bench that positive steps are being taken to ensure that there will be a distinct improvement in the payment of those allowances next year. I am prepared to say loudly and clearly that there were considerable problems last year and I hope that we do not experience those administrative problems during the coming year. We are all part of a caring society and I claim to be part of a caring party. However, on that issue I know that there is room for considerable improvement.

I accept the suggestion that 42 per cent. of the facilities of the National Health Service are used by the elderly without qualification. If that is so, I am able to say, again with a sense of confidence, that spending on the NHS has gone up year by year and is a particular credit to the Government. We are particularly directing our attention to geriatric care for the infirm and those in considerable difficulty.

Let the message go out loud and clear that the number of consultants engaged in geriatric care in this country since 1979 has gone up by 34 per cent. I am proud of a party that has done that. In addition, the number of nurses engaged in looking after the elderly has gone up by 18 per cent. That is not enough. We are looking not only at the medical staff and the nurses but the facilities. How good it is to know that the Government have gone forward with a programme which has given a 31 per cent. increase in the amount of buildings in connection with the care of the elderly.

I believe—and this view may be shared on both sides of the Chamber—that the real caring community is not within geriatric wards or the NHS. To me, the hallmark of a caring society is within the home and family. I am perfectly prepared to stand up and be counted as one who cherishes the family unit. It is interesting to note that the increase in the number of places providing day care, which is a tremendous relief to those caring for the elderly, has increased by 4,000 since 1978.

I was saddened when the spokesman for the Opposition, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), said that a Labour Government would increase the retirement pension of a married couple by £8 and that of a single pensioner by £5. When questioned, he held firm to those figures, and gave a policy commitment that they would continue year upon year. In the midst of the 1983 general election the then Opposition spokesman on social services produced a figure of £11.

I do not believe that the British public want their pensions to be subject to an auction. They want a firm and fair pension and low inflation. I was pleased when I heard the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye, the alliance's spokesman in this debate, say that the alliance would introduce a pension increase of £1·5o.

When we start talking about caring for the community and the people within it, I recall that prior to my election to this place I was for many years the spokesman of my local authority on social services. Socialist and Conservative members worked together and understood that when it came to social services the issues concerned people and not politics.

Mr. Kennedy: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman's flow. He has said that the alliance would introduce a pension increase of £1·50p. I should have made it clear—I think I read out the figures—that we would increase the pension to £68·95. That must be compared with the Government's £61·30. I think that he will accept that the alliance proposes to introduce a significant increase.

Dr. Blackburn: I accept that I made a mistake. I thought that the hon. Gentleman said £63 and not £68. I apologise.

The local authority on which I served spoke with one voice in caring for the people for which it was responsible electorally. I recall receiving in 1978 one of the most memorable telephone calls in my life. I received a phone call at my home at half-past eight in the morning and was told to go to the town hall straight away. When I arrived, I discovered that the then Labour Government had been forced by the International Monetary Fund to make drastic reductions in their expenditure. The authority was called upon to cut its social services budget by £6 million within 24 hours. I am delighted to say — this reflects great credit on the authority — that we set about rearranging the budget responsibly and constructively to make allowance for the reduction that had been forced upon us by the then Socialist Government.

Mr. Corbyn: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell us on which local authority he served and the cuts that it has been instructed to make by the Conservative Government since 1979 in the form of reduced rate support grant and reduced block grant.

Dr. Blackburn: Certainly. I had the privilege of serving on Wolverhampton borough council, which became the Wolverhampton metropolitan council. The meeting to which I have referred took place in 1976, when the authority was under the control of a Socialist administration. Since that time the authority has had a record of extremely high spending, which resulted in a 56 per cent. wage increase two years ago. It is responsible to the electorate for that level of spending. I do not believe that social service provision has been significantly increased as a result of the increased expenditure on the part of the authority.

I was disappointed when the Christmas bonus was described by the hon. Member for Oldham, West, who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, as piffling.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman must have misheard my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr.

Meacher). He said that the way in which the Minister uses the Christmas bonus when he cannot think of anything else to say is piffling.

Dr. Blackburn: In musical terms, that is a variation on a theme. Whether piffling or not, I am proud to say that it is part of our policy, part of our principle and part of Britain's statute law.

Dr. Godman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Blackburn: No, I will not. I have given way four times already.

In my experience in this place and in local authority work, I have found that one of the keynotes of growth in social services and in caring for the elderly, the sick and the infirm is something which we seem to forget. It is called value for money. I am delighted to know that the important work that is undertaken by the Audit Commission is designed to ensure that there is the fullest utilisation of resources.

Like all other hon. Members, I take my political and constituency duties extremely seriously. A constituent came to me in considerable distress—I know that this is the experience of many other hon. Members—and told me that he had been waiting eight months for a hip replacement operation.

Dr. Godman: People wait for three years in Scotland for that operation.

Dr. Blackburn: Very well, there is a three-year wait in Scotland.

I found to my astonishment that facilities were available to carry out hip replacement operations. It seems that the difficulty is that the facilities are not available in the areas where they are needed. It was possible to transfer my constituent to Stanmore, Middlesex—a distance of about 100 miles—and the operation was performed in two weeks. There are many success stories of that sort that we can recount. I understand that 28,000 hip replacement operations were carried out in 1979 and that since then the number has increased to 37,000. These figures do not spell out a decrease in the number of these operations. Instead, they tell us that we have a caring community which is prepared to carry out hip replacement surgery for the benefit of the elderly.

I turn to the vexed question of personal social services, on which spending has increased since 1979 from £436 million to £1·5 billion. Whichever way those figures are considered, they are evidence of a caring society and caring Government and not of reduced expenditure.

Dr. Godman rose——

Dr. Blackburn: We have been told this evening by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye, on behalf of the alliance, that an alliance administration would increase the death grant to £250. One of the blessings of the Social Security Bill is that in future a widow will receive a tax-free lump sum of £1,000 on the death of her husband. She will receive that sum at a time of great emotion and distress and it will be a considerable blessing.

It is critical, as a matter of honour, that if policies on the care of the elderly throughout this land are to be presented in this House, they must operate within the bounds of arithmetic. I find it difficult to believe that the Opposition's proposal would work within the bounds of arithmetic, when we know, and have spelt out loud and clear, that the costings are £5·6 million, not £3·3 million. It is a deceit above words to present that sort of policy to our people.

The British people should applaud the work that has been undertaken by the Government to produce a rate of inflation of 2·5 per cent. When the pages of history are written, we shall find that this has been one of those periods of administration which has brought the greatest blessing possible to pensioners, the sick, the aged and the infirm. I salute the Minister on the Front Bench, my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major).

8.40 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The House will not take it amiss if I refer to a former colleague who passed away this morning. He was a champion of pensioners and an extremely effective holder of the Chair. I am speaking of the late Lord Dick Crawshaw. Like many of my colleagues, I was extremely sad and I disapproved when he changed to the SDP, but may it be always to his memory and credit that we never heard him criticise his former colleagues. To the end he remained a friend to many of us and he is a loss to Parliament.

I shall raise three issues. First, what are the Department's projections for the likely number of elderly people in the 1990s through to 2020? We hear that the latest projections are horrific, which is why I am rather against ya-boo politics on this issue. We shall face a most appalling problem over the next three decades. We shall somehow have to carry a burden of rising expectations and increased numbers of elderly people.

One way of coping with the position is through the respite allowance, and the Minister for Social Security mentioned it in his opening remarks. What money is involved in the respite allowance? The respite allowance is one of the most cost-effective and humane ways of helping people care for others. Many people wish to remain in their homes until their late 80s or early 90s and they should be helped to do so. That often means that some holiday and rest must be given to the carers. Therefore, what money is available?

Secondly, I recommend to the Ministers the section of the Crossman diaries—it seems to be fashionable to dig up all sorts of texts from them—which deals with what Dick Crossman did when the Cypriot nurse came to the Department to spill the beans on the Ely hospital. It deals with the whole issue of Ely, Farley and South Ockendon, and how the Minister of the day got a great deal of money from the Cabinet by highlighting what at first looked like a scandal, but which was a genuine, serious situation.

In some areas our care of the elderly mentally ill is back in the mid-1960s. Some hospitals are extremely good and much excellent work has been done in building and nursing. However, some places—I shall not name them because I am not after headlines or publicity—have returned to mid-1960s standards. I think that the Department knows exactly the sort of institution about which I am speaking where the conditions that prevailed in the mid-1960s which so upset Dick Crossman prevail now in the mid-1980s. Every Scot who has been watching the programmes on Lennoxtown castle will know the problems there. I am not highlighting them for political advantage. Indeed, the staff there have worked extremely hard.

The Minister has just entered the Chamber, and I was commending that he should read the sections of the

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

Crossman diaries that refer to Ely, Farley and South Ockendon because the conditions in some hospitals have returned to the standards of the 1960s. I can give an example of that. Mrs. Hendry, the wife of the distinguished Edinburgh engineer Professor Hendry, is the chairman of a number of boards and is extremely rational. She knows of many cases where patients have been given back the wrong false teeth. That is a very human situation and simply reflects the shortage of staff in certain areas. What is the Government's thinking on that?

Thirdly, I come to the question of dental charges. I had a word with the Secretary of State who courteously said that either he would write to me or that notes would be provided for the reply. The problem is that more and more dentists are having to make judgments, not on clinical matters, but on the extent to which some of their patients can afford to pay for their treatment. The difficulty is that there are all sorts of anomalies in relation to the elderly. One is that there are charges for dental X-rays but not for X-rays for other parts of the body. The Department is probably seized of the problems put by the General Dental Practitioners Association and others.

Another problem relates to new materials. What does the Department think of the provision of expensive new dental materials? The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) is present. He will recollect that the Secretary of State for Scotland said to the Scottish Grand Committee that we should understand that demands on health care were infinite and that one could never satisfy everyone. I accept what he said, especially about raising expectations. The truth is that in dentistry, as in medicine, many sophisticated and, therefore, expensive materials can be used. Has the Department a philosophy on the extent to which new materials are a priority and should be provided, particularly for the comfort of the elderly?

I promised to make a short speech. I have put my points and I should welcome either a letter or answers in the reply.

8.48 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): The Opposition motion complains about the break of the link with earnings in the system for uprating state pensions. The Opposition are seeking to bring us back to the debates which we have had over many years as to whether upratings should be based on earnings or prices.

I support the Government's philosophy and what they are doing. Their solution to the finance of old age is different from what the Opposition have in mind. The Government propose that pensioners should be able to rely on two sources of income. The first is a basic income guarantee, which is not means-tested, but is every citizen's right; and the second is a variable earnings-related retirement benefit to enable people to retire in the standard of life to which they have become accustomed during working life through an occupational pension scheme or some other form of private provision for retirement. That philosophy is right, and we should build on it.

The question inevitably arises whether the occupational pension schemes and other private schemes are sufficiently good. They are in the public sector, because it has established an extremely generous earnings-related retirement scheme. Indeed, some people think that in some respects public sector schemes are too generous, but I shall not go into that now. Public sector schemes cost about 20 per cent. on top of the remuneration for the people in work. Therefore, if comparable benefits are to accrue in the private sector, we must look for contributions of about 20 per cent. on top of earnings, and possibly even more. That level of contribution is not flowing into the private sector at present, so inevitably there will continue to be disappointments and inadequacies for those in private sector schemes.

The National Association of Pension Funds survey for 1984 contains some interesting figures. Of course, it deals only with schemes that belong to the association. It says that for non-contributory schemes the overall average employer's contribution was 17·24 per cent. for staff schemes — not too bad — but only 6·83 per cent. for works schemes, and 16 per cent. for combined schemes. For contributory schemes, the corresponding figures are 11·95 per cent., 7·26 per cent. and 10·48 per cent. Those figures are not sufficient to produce the sort of income that people are entitled to expect in retirement. The result, sadly, is that a large number of people are dependent in retirement on supplementary benefit. They cannot stand on their own feet and we have to help them to a minimum standard of living through supplementary benefit, or housing benefits of one sort or another for those who inevitably find themselves over-housed when they have finished their working lives.

As I have said in the House before, 14 million people are now dependent on means-tested benefits. That is a large number of people who cannot rely on their savings and resources. It is something to which the Government must address their mind urgently if they are to justify their philosophy—which I believe to be right—to the electors.

Many people do not belong to occupational pension schemes, or belong only to schemes not as generous as those analysed in the survey. I wish to draw attention to the fact that a substantial element of members of occupational pension schemes get a raw deal. I refer to the early leavers — people who, for one reason or another, change their jobs during their careers. I calculated some years ago, and the figures are likely still to be true, that when someone who has been in full-time employment with a generous occupational pension scheme changes his job in mid-career he is likely to be writing off an asset that is at least as valuable as his house. That is a very large sacrifice to better oneself by changing employment. Ironically, the more generous the scheme, the more that is lost by changing jobs. That position has obtained for far too long. As a result, a large number of people reach retirement but are then unable to manage on their own resources.

I regret that the Government did not go through with their original intention to abolish the state earnings-related pension scheme, making good the gap by turning over the current employers' contribution to national insurance — and preferably the employees' contribution also—to accumulate in an approved tax-exempt fund on the principle of money-purchase and proper funding. It was a mistake not to have had the courage to go through with that.

The money that goes into the pension schemes should be recognised as the employees' deferred pay. It is their money and they should not be deprived of it. It should flow either into a national pension scheme that would invest it in Government indexed stocks on compound interest, or into one of the many approved schemes in the private sector.

In any event, occupational pension schemes will continue to play a very important part in providing retirement income. Whatever the position with the state scheme, we must pay attention to what is happening with private schemes; there are likely to be several million people in those schemes for the foreseeable future. Apart from the fact that not enough money is flowing into them to provide satisfactory benefits, the major deficiency that must be rectified is the shabby treatment of early leavers. There is still a great deal to be done in that area.

I know that recently the Government have made efforts and there has been some recognition of the problem, but on the best information that I can obtain from people who have access to the best data, I calculate that people who change their jobs are forfeiting at least £20 million every week from the assets that have accumulated on their accounts in their occupational penson schemes. We cannot allow that scandal to continue.

The suggestion that I hope that I shall be entitled to make in our debate on the Report stage of the Finance Bill is that an overpowering incentive should be given to occupational pension schemes to rectify that position through their tax treatment; I shall not try to develop that argument now. The real problem with the treatment of early leavers is the divided departmental responsibility in regard to occupational schemes. That was brought out in his presidential address to the actuaries by Professor Moore this year. Too many different Government Departments have responsibility in this area. The Treasury is concerned about the tax angle, the DHSS is interested in the schemes as an aspect of social security, and the Department of Employment is interested because of the implications for job mobility.

It is now 18 years since I made my first speech in the House on this subject. I am glad that we have made a little progress, but we have not yet done nearly enough for the members of occupational pension schemes who change their jobs. Present legislation will not bring them justice even in 40 years when it comes into full effect. In my opinion, and that of very many others, we cannot wait that long. Will the Secretary of State undertake to set up an inter-departmental review of the matter forthwith, with a view to publishing a White Paper before the end of the year?

If the Government, quite rightly, are to rely on private provision for retirement, the scandal of the schemes that give shabby treatment to early leavers must be put right. We cannot allow private citizens to forfeit more than £1,000 million of their savings each year simply because they have chosen — or been forced — to change their employment.

8.58 pm

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): I take on board what the Minister for Social Security said in opening. No matter how robustly he tries to defend the Government's position, he offers no solution to the basic problem. The question of pensions and retirement must be looked at with entirely different eyes. People argue that one of the things that measures how much a society cares is how it treats its aged, its poor, its sick and its young.

When an average working class man retires, having worked for 50 years, or 45 years in the case of a woman, he wants to enjoy the rest of his days by pursuing his own interests rather than those dictated by his employer. People should be able to look forward to their retirement. Men and women who have created the wealth of the nation by spending their working lives in industry should approach their retirement in a happy frame of mind.

Over the years — under successive Governments — millions of people have faced retirement with fear, apprehension and insecurity. Virtually overnight, they faced a dramatic fall in their living standards. The worries and concerns of such people are genuine. No matter how robustly the Minister defends the Government's position, he does not solve the problem.

I believe that our attitude to pensioners shows that we have an almost total contempt and disregard for what must be done. Britain is not an impoverished nation. It is a wealthy nation. It is said that Britain is the fifth wealthiest nation in the world. If the political will is there, there is no reason why we cannot remove that apprehension, fear, insecurity and, in many cases, the poverty that follows retirement.

When we consider the differences in the social classes, we find that those on the highest incomes, such as managers and directors of boards, who have accumulated wealth at the expense of those who produced it, find no difficulty, when their working life has ended, moving from one period to another. They move with the ease of a person moving from a non-smoking compartment to a smoking compartment in a train. We are not talking about the generality of retirement, pensions, and all the problems that people face. We are talking about working class people, many of whom cannot rely on an occupational pension because no provision was made for such a pension during their working life.

It is a scandal that Ministers of State — it does not matter which party is in government — bandy around figures and point to the performance of previous Governments rather than tackle the problem. This country's pensioners are fourth in the league made up of their comparable European counterparts. Pensions in this country are lower than in most European countries. It is a scandal that a wealthy country such as ours should ignore the plight of pensioners. It does no one any good to point to the performance of previous Governments.

Since I have been a Member of Parliament, I have been consistent — whether my party has been in power or not — in advancing the arguments that I advance today. We must reconceive the whole question of pensions and people's entitlements. I do not just refer to pensions. However, that is the main purpose of the discussion. We must return to a system of tying pensions to national average earnings.

I impress upon the Minister that pensioners do not want handouts. They do not want grants that enable them to do this and that. Heating allowances may resolve a problem for a time. What a pensioner needs, and should have, is sufficient money in his pocket to get the things that he or she needs and which, in my view, he or she deserves. Pensioners created the wealth that we inherited. The Government have ignored that basic question.

There must be recognition of the rights of pensioners, not because they are becoming a powerful electoral group but because the aging population is living longer and, therefore, in the future the problems and burdens will be greater. I reject the prognosis of many people and the point mooted in the review that in future it will not be possible to meet even the meagre amount of the state pension. It is an indictment of society to suggest that the pensions of the future will be in danger. There is no evidence that the private sector will make provision for retired people.

The Government have disregarded the important point that pensioners want in their pockets sufficient money to allow them to live a decent life, to have enough for food and clothing and to keep warm. Year after year, people weep crocodile tears about deaths from hypothermia when people die merely because they are cold. However, nothing has been done to eliminate that problem. Arbitrary figures are bandied about considering whether need exists. Meanwhile, people are dying. That is an indictment of society and of any Government who allow it to continue.

I hope that the Minister will reflect on what this means for present and future pensioners. The problem must be tackled. We must condition people to believe that retirement should be a period of pleasure when they can pursue the activities that they were previously denied. Retirement should be a happy time in their lives, not one burdened with its present difficulties. I hope that Government and Labour Members will take note of that point both during this debate and in the weeks and months ahead.

9.6 pm

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): The hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) feels, as I do—unlike the spokesman for the Opposition—that the welfare of pensioners is not and should not be made a party matter. It is a matter of caring and neither side of the House and no party in it has a monopoly on care for elderly people.

We all know of the propensity of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) for throwing accuracy out the window, which matches the way he welcomes hyperbole in through the door. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has so quickly left his place. Perhaps he has gone off to the confessional. Perhaps he is doing his sums, because that is certainly necessary. Perhaps he is even now apologising to the Leader of the Opposition for having dropped him in it on such a scale.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West said that pensioners today were worse off than when pensions began. I challenge that. When pensions began, a married couple was paid £2·10 a week. I am told that that would be worth about £24 today. This month, a married couple will receive a pension of £61·95.

Mrs. Beckett: I am sorry that the hon. Lady chose to make those uncharitable and foolish remarks about my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). I am afraid that she did not listen to, or did not hear, what he said. According to the fruits of independent research—not my hon. Friend's figures—compared to the standard of living of the average worker, the pensioner is now worse off. My hon. Friend was, of course, as shocked as the hon. Lady to discover that.

Dame Jill Knight: That is simply the way that one reads the figures. I am going through the details to show why the pensioner today, thank God—and it is due to all parties and all people who have cared enough to try to help—is very much better off than when pensions began—not as much as we would wish, but the pensioner is certainly better off.

When pensions began, there was no question of concessionary fares. There was no question of dietary allowance or heating additions. There was no question of help with the rates or social services help, which assists so many elderly people in need today. We must recognise that when pensions began the people receiving them would not have dreamed of the help which, rightly, would be made available to them in future years. One example is walking frames.

Mr. Kennedy: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Dame Jill Knight: The hon. Gentleman has had quite a go already. I want to try to finish quickly because others wish to speak.

Other examples are wheelchairs, meals on wheels, day centres and hospital care. I speak with feeling because for some years I was a member of the health committee on a local authority. We pioneered the idea of sheltered housing for the elderly—a place where they could be given a home where there was a warden. All those benefits have been given, and they are undeniable. When one looks them in the face, one cannot possibly say that pensioners today are worse off than when pensions began.

A great deal of play has been made of the fact that people are waiting for hip operations. Very little play has been made of the fact that they are getting them. My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) gave the figure. To me, it is a wonderful thing that so many elderly people are able to walk without pain because of the advance of medical science. We should recognise that that must have changed their lives out of all recognition. I can think of many other operations, such as the glaucoma operation, which would not have been possible years ago. There is also help with drugs and prescriptions.

Sometimes I think that Opposition Members tend to believe that if everybody cannot have something free, we must not pretend that anyone has it free. I admire the speech by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). I am sorry that I am not able to tell him this to his face. With regard to dental charges for the elderly, he rightly made the reasonable comment that it seems crazy that one can have an X-ray of part of one's body for nothing, but if one has a mouth X-ray one has to pay. The reason why an X-ray is free is that it is carried out at a general hospital. It is possible for people to go along and have an X-ray in the dental section of a hospital. Certainly, in Birmingham we have a dental hospital where anyone can go and, without charge, have a necessary X-ray of his mouth. Elderly people who need dental care and who receive either supplementary benefit or housing benefit are exempt from all charges for dental treatment, which would include X-rays. Those who are just above supplementary benefit level can also claim exemption. Those things are important advances.

I must take the hon. Member for Oldham, West to task for some of the phrases that he flung out. He talked about handouts to taxpayers. That is a favourite phrase. I wish that he would understand that it is not a handout to a taxpayer; the taxpayer is merely allowed to keep a little more of his own money, which he has earned by the sweat of his brow. Labour Members talk about handouts as if a mythical hand has gone into the national till and given the taxpayers money. In fact, our measures mean that taxpayers may keep more of their own money. That is a very real difference.

The hon. Gentleman also shot out a phrase beloved of many Labour spokesmen—"the means test". He said that Labour would abolish the demeaning means test. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench have taken that fully on board. Abolishing the means test means giving money to anyone who holds out his hand. When spending public money one has a responsibility to taxpayers to ensure that their money is paid out only to those who need it. Without a means test, we cannot know who needs it. I am very much against giving public money to people who do not need it. It is salutary to know that the Labour party would abolish the means test. In real terms, that means that to anyone who asks, cash must be given. If that system comes back—God help us if it does—there will be the biggest forest of palms from here to the middle east.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West said that pensioners should share in the increasing prosperity of this country. We all agree with that, but I doubt whether there will be any increasing prosperity if the hon. Gentleman's suggestions are implemented because inflation would immediately be pushed upwards again which would be the worst thing possible for pensioners. The hon. Member for Oldham, West seems content to offer glittering prizes but is not prepared to reckon the cost of those prizes, even to those who will receive them.

I thought that the argument about the change in the method of calculation had already been won and I was amazed to hear it raised again. The Labour Government changed the method of forecasting pension increases in 1976. They said that pension increases would be based on what they thought—not what they knew, because they did not know—the rate of inflation might be. In so doing, they saved themselves a handy £500 million. Moreover, that method of calculation proved wrong five times out of seven. Do Labour Members think that we should stick to a method which clearly does not work? We might as well bring in the crystal ball or the ouija board or pull the petals off a daisy. Even that would be better than sticking to a method which has proved wrong more often than right.

Surely it is better to give increases, albeit small ones, several times a year to keep pensions up with any rise in the cost of living. There were plenty of complaints in the House and outside when pensions were increased only once a year, but when the Government moved to a system allowing several increases per year they provoked a wave of fury because pensions were not increased by £3 or £4 three or four times a year. It would be nice to be able to do that, but at least we can keep pensioners abreast and, one hopes, a little ahead of any rise in inflation.

Whether we can honour promises to pensioners in future years is not a matter of will. It is a sad fact that in the future there will be far fewer people working than in the pensioner age group, due to population changes. That is where the worry arises and we must never let pensioners down by promising something that we cannot provide.

Mr. Loyden: Does the hon. Lady agree that, regardless of how many people are working, through modern technology and so on, wealth is still being produced at higher levels than it was? Is not the redistribution of wealth rather than its creation the problem?

Dame Jill Knight: I agree that increased technology and so on should provide more wealth. However, there are still fewer people in the working age group. That is the root of the trouble.

I am glad strongly to support the Government's amendment. Although we would wish to do more, what has been done should be recognised.

9.20 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Listening to some Conservative Members makes a question spring to mind. If the Government are so caring and humane an Administration, why are the electorate so deeply disenchanted with the Conservative party? Many pensioners I know would not respond favourably to the speeches about their problems that we have heard.

I have to disagree mildly with some of the things said by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden), who spoke about pensioners being happy if they are protected and their interests promoted. I have much more sympathy with what Charles de Gaulle said about the old. He said that age is a shipwreck, and I agree with that. We have to protect and promote the interests of the elderly as best we can, and that might mean that those of us in employment have to make a greater contribution.

I represent thousands of pensioners who live in appallingly inadequate housing conditions. About 6,000 public sector houses in my constituency are acknowledged by the council to be suffering from damp, and many pensioners live under these circumstances. Much more needs to be done for them.

I have a question for the Minister about a constituency case. An elderly constituent of mine, a widow, recently visited her daughter and son-in-law in Holland where, unfortunately, she suffered a heart attack and died. Her daughter in Holland is on the Dutch equivalent of our social welfare. She wanted to send her mother's body back to Greenock as her mother had always expressed the heartfelt desire to be buried alongside her late husband in Greenock. The remaining daughter in Greenock, who is also on supplementary benefit, and the rest of the family managed to raise about £950 to bring the mother's body back for burial. They were £310 short, so they applied to the local DHSS for an urgent needs payment.

As I said several times in Committee on the Social Security Bill, I have great respect for the managers of the two local DHSS offices in my constituency at Greenock and Port Glasgow. I also respect the hard work done on the whole courteously and unflaggingly by their officials. However, in this tragic case the request for an urgent needs payment was turned down. The Dutch authorities have said to the daughter in Vlissingen in Holland and to the daughter in Greenock in Scotland that if the local Member of Parliament can provide documentary proof that the British system has turned down the application they will try to help the family to meet the shortfall of £310.

I appeal to the Minister to intervene in this case. I have written to the manager of the local office, Mr. Andrews, in the hope that the local adjudicator will consider again the request for payment. The family is prepared somehow to save the money rather than go to the Dutch authorities. I hope that our authorities can provide the family with the £310 and take away the stigma that has besmirched the old lady's dying wish that she be buried alongside her husband.

[Dr. Norman A. Godman]

There is a great need for more sheltered housing for my elderly constituents. Recently I attended the opening of a sheltered housing complex that is sponsored and managed by the Church of Scotland. It is a first class establishment run by an excellent team. The people residing in that complex have their own flats. The regime is so humane and compassionate that in two cases elderly people have living with them disabled children who are themselves well into middle age. The provision of sheltered housing needs to be extended throughout the country but particularly in areas such as mine where, according to official figures, about 33,000 people, or 42·9 per cent. of my constituents, are living on or below the supplementary benefit level.

Another important issue with which the Minister is familiar concerns the problems inflicted on pensioners by spells of exceptionally severe weather. Some months ago I asked the Minister how many single payments had been made to claimants in Scotland under the regulations. At that time the figure was 57,000, but the Minister said that many more claims were being processed. I have another question down to be answered next week. I suspect that the total will be much higher than the interim figure.

Many people, particularly pensioners, have complained to me about the difficulties that are associated with applying for exceptionally severe weather payments. That applies particularly to pensioners who are still buying coal from what might be called itinerant coal dealers.

I sincerely hope that the heating additions for spells of exceptionally severe weather will be improved to avoid the humiliation that so often surrounds applications for single payments of this kind.

Many other areas need to be discussed, but my immediate concern relates to the problems that are faced by my constituent. I shall be deeply grateful if the Minister will take on board that serious problem.

9.30 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): This has been an interesting debate. At the beginning of her remarks the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) referred to a very unusual concept in politics, from which issues such as pension levels are apparently excluded. Politics are, more than anything else, about choices. The choices that have been made by this Government are at the heart of this debate. The hon. Lady also said—and I agree entirely with her—that what has been done by this Government ought to be recognised. That is the purpose of our motion and of the speeches that have been made by Opposition Members.

One of the greatest achievements of the past decade was the recognition of the universal poverty that exists among so many elderly people. The tragedy of the last few years has been the slow but steady progress towards the return of that considerable poverty. A major contribution towards it so far has been the break in the link between earnings and pensions and the steady cut in housing benefit.

Another major contribution that the Government are making in this direction is their changes to the state earnings-related pension scheme and occupational pensions. It is too little recognised that the Government are cutting, indeed halving, the value of the state earnings-related pension scheme, along with the basic pension. Furthermore, by lowering the standards of the state scheme the Government are also lowering the standards that are required to be met by occupational pensions, thereby — in one fell swoop — worsening the pension entitlement of everybody, whatever kind of pension scheme they happen to be in.

The cost and the problems involved in breaking the link between pensions and earnings are so great that in time they will have offset even the increase that is due to the state earnings-related pension scheme, as it was originally designed. Therefore, the total pension — the earnings-related supplement and the basic pension itself — will gradually fall back to a level that is no higher than that of the basic pension today. However, as the Government have introduced proposals, which we expect shortly to be returned to this House, substantially to reduce the state earnings-related pension scheme, the total pension — basic and earnings-related alike — will be substantially less over a period than today's basic pension.

The example that we give — which the Government have never contradicted, or argued with, or questioned, apart from saying that to dwell on the details of the figures would be tedious—is that a 16-year-old who starts work after the Social Security Bill becomes law, who never has a sustained period of unemployment and who never has a sustained period of sickness will receive a pension when he retires that is only half that which he would have received before that Bill became law.

I refer to a young person with a full employment record. Those who are unfortunate enough, for whatever reason, not to have a full employment record will receive even less than the half pension to which they will be entitled under the Government's proposals. Those with low earnings at some period during their working lives will have their pension disproportionately affected and disproportionately reduced, because the Government have decided that the pension should be calculated no longer over the best 20, 30 or 40 years but over a full working life. That inexorably means that far more pensioners will be dependent on the equivalent of supplementary benefit in future than are dependent on it today. Today 1·7 million pensioners are so dependent alongside the 4·2 million receiving housing benefit.

The Minister talked about the record of the previous Labour Government, a topic of which Ministers are especially fond. They would much rather talk about the Labour Government's record than about their own. I believe that the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) holds the record in this respect, having dragged in and attacked the Labour Government of 1947 on one occasion. Perhaps, not surprisingly, the hon. Gentleman rather glossed over the record of his own Government. As he always does, the hon. Member for Ealing, North dragged in the fact that the Christmas bonus was stopped at the loss of £20 to pensioners over a period of five years.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): That was a lot of money at the time.

Mrs. Beckett: Indeed it was. However, as the hon. Lady would have known if she had been present earlier, it is rather less than the £570 which the Government have taken from pensioners by breaking the link with earnings.

In his enthusiasm, the Minister forgot that when the Government delayed the pension uprating for two weeks in 1980 the cost to a pensioner couple was £12·30 and in 1984, when they delayed the uprating by a further week, the cost was £2·80. I recall the then Minister of State justifying that on the ground that, if the date was not changed, in 250 years' time there would be two pension increases in one year. At the time, we did not think that that was a strong argument but it was the best that the former Minister of State could do other than attack the Labour Government's record.

I believe that it was the hon. Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) who mentioned that heating allowances under this Government are running at record levels. So, of course, are fuel costs. These have been increased by the deliberate decision of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to raise money by putting a tax on fuel to give benefits to the wealthiest through tax cuts.

The Minister took credit for the increase in spending on social services only to be shot down in flames by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) who said that the Government continually criticise and try to undermine the extent of spending on social services in Labour-controlled authorities across the country on the grounds that they are spending too much. The Minister forgot to mention that the Government's contribution to social services expenditure has fallen — if I recall correctly — by over 10 per cent. as rate support grant has been slashed. The Minister also forgot to mention how the Government refused the Opposition's pleas to exempt pensioners from what he recognised at the time was likely to be the higher cost of glasses under the Health and Social Security Act 1984.

The Minister forgot to mention the substantial increase in prescription charges. There was a little talk earlier about clear pledges. If ever there was a clear pledge, it was the one given by the Prime Minister in 1979 not to increase prescription charges. That pledge was almost as clear as the Prime Minister's 1983 pledge not to attack the state earnings-related pension scheme.

The Minister barely mentioned housing benefit in his glowing account of the Government's record. Perhaps he did not do that because between April 1983 and November 1985 the Government saved £233 million in housing benefit during which period 600,000 pensioners lost all entitlement to housing benefit. That is not surprising, as pensioners are the largest group relying on housing benefit. There are 4 million pensioner households in all.

In the Social Security Bill the Government are making room for further substantial losses in housing benefit. Using the Government's figures from the technical annexe, it appears that an average pensioner couple paying average rent will receive nearly £3 a week less housing benefit than they would have had to set against the same rent in 1982 before the last series of cuts began. That is due to changes in the taper. It has been calculated that 650,000 pensioner households will lose as a result of the proposed changes. Up to £2 a week will be lost by 450,000; 110,000 will lose up to £3 a week; 90,000 will lose £3 or more a week and 30,000 of those will lose more than £5 a week. Some 140,000 will cease to be entitled to any housing benefit.

All that will happen before the proposal to deduct 20 per cent. of rates and water rates from those in receipt of supplementary benefit. If that is added to the taper changes to which I have just referred, nearly 3 million pensioner households will lose out through the Government's proposals. Up to £1 a week will be lost by 1,150,000, and a similar number will lose £2 a week, 270,000 will lose up to £3 a week and 170,000 will lose £3 or more a week, of which some 30,000 will lose over £5 a week.

I am sure that those figures, like the figures on basic pensions, are a little tedious for the Government, but they are of some considerable interest and significance to pensioners. Quite apart from that, the introduction of a capital limit will mean that some 250,000 pensioners will lose their entitlement to housing benefit. Again, we are seeing a further £450 million or so cut, saved or lost from housing benefit by the actions of this caring Government, praised so heartily by their Back Benchers during the debate.

That brings me directly to the calculations that the Minister claimed to have done on various issues, including housing benefit, on the costing proposals put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West. It is only right to say straight away that the Minister has costed not the proposals put forward by my hon. Friend but some wholly fictitious package of his own. The hon. Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn), who was here and was presumably listening to the Minister, had the gall to talk about deceit in the context of my hon. Friend's remarks and what we are setting before the country. There are few things more deceitful than fabricating a set of proposals, adding up the cost and then claiming that one's opponents are responsible for proposals that are not theirs. It should be made clear that the Minister costed his proposals, not ours.

However, let me ask a question on the Minister's proposals. How much of the cost of his proposals is due to restoring cuts in housing benefit already made under the Government to which I have referred? How much is due to the cuts that are being made under the Social Security Bill — cuts which the Government are proposing to restore in this place in a week's time, having lost in another place, perhaps even, it is rumoured, on the day of the royal wedding?

We had some interesting information and examples recently of the Government's costings. The Minister had the gall to take the credit, in the face of the decision by the European Court, for the decision to extend the invalid care allowance to married women, something that they were forced into and have steadfastly been refusing to do for seven years. [Interruption.] I wish that the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) would cease interrupting. If he had been here earlier, he would have heard my hon. Friend give the costs, and he can read them in the Official Report.

For the past several years the Minister has told us that the cost of extending the invalid care allowance to married women would be £85 million. Now that he is going to do it he tells us that it is £55 million, which I estimate is slightly over 35 per cent. less than his original claim. If we deduct 35 per cent. from what the Government claim to be the cost of our proposals, that might be more accurate.

But the main point and the main problem of the debate is that there is poverty among the elderly and that that poverty is increasing and will be substantially worsened by the Government's plans. Under this Government, poverty has increased, but that increase pales into insignificance beside what is in store for the elderly under the policies likely to be brought back before the House before we rise for the summer.

The motion calls for priority for pensioners. It calls for a reversal of the tax changes and the concessions given to the wealthiest people in Britain and for that reversal to be done in order to give priority to pensioners. The Minister appears to say nothing to that argument. All he says is that he has costed our proposals—although he has actually costed his own—and he argues that reversing the tax concessions and changes would not be sufficient to pay for what we would give to pensioners.

If the Under-Secretary argues that our costings are wrong, although we do not accept that, and reversing the £3,600 million given to the wealthiest 5 per cent. of people in Britain every year by the Government's tax changes would not provide the pension increases that we claim, I challenge him to tell the House what pension increase that would fund and then tell us why the Government will not do it.

9.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): In the middle of the debate, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) paid a generous and warm tribute to Lord Crawshaw, who died last evening. I believe that the whole House would wish to echo that. He was a kind and gentle man who many of us will recall with some affection. He will be sadly missed by his many friends in this place and along the Corridor.

I am grateful to the Opposition for bringing this important subject before the House, albeit on a motion which is bizarre in its selectivity. We have heard yet again the old, familiar, unsustainable and unrealistic cry that the Government are not doing enough and that they do not care. It is the old story from the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and his colleagues, and we have grown accustomed to it. That charge is neither accurate nor sustainable.

When moving the motion in the Newcastle-under-Lyme address, as we may come to think of it, the hon. Member for Oldham, West illustrated yet again one of the principal facets of his delightful character—the fact that he is unable to resist temptation. Not for him self-denial in words or expenditure, whether it be expenditure from his own pocket or that of taxpayers. He set out once again a catalogue of electoral offers for the next general election.

I do not doubt the Opposition's genuine wish to help the elderly. We have the same ambition. I am beginning, however, to suspect that the hon. Gentleman will offer anything on any occasion to any group for any purpose at any time if he thinks that that will buy a vote or two. One of the hon. Gentleman's characteristics—we enjoy it—is that he always overbids. He is the man who cannot say no. If somebody wants it, in the programme it goes, and he hopes that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) does not notice or cannot add up. If the Labour party was ever able to carry out its plans, it would have its hands in the taxpayers' pockets more often than the taxpayers themselves.

The House will be stunned to learn that the hon. Member for Oldham, West visited Newcastle-under-Lyme yesterday, where he added to his previously extensive spending plans. Among other things, he committed himself yesterday to abolishing all prescription charges.

Mr. Meacher: Not immediately. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] Read what I said.

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman intervenes before he hears what I am about to say. I suspect that he has a guilty conscience. I was about to say that it was not clear how rapidly he would abolish prescription charges, but it was clear that they would be abolished. When and if the hon. Gentleman gets an opportunity to do that, and if he does it, I hope that he will bear in mind that it will not help the elderly, for they are already exempt from prescription charges.

Mr. Meacher: Why does the hon. Gentleman mention it then?

Mr. Major: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman why if he gives me a moment. The change would help the hon. Gentleman and me, for we would no longer have to pay, and £135 million would be lost to the National Health Service. It would be a redistribution from the NHS to middle-income earners such as the hon. Gentleman and me, and it would come courtesy of the Labour party. I hope that pensioners, upon whom that £135 million could usefully be spent, will enjoy that piece of regressive redistribution to which the hon. Gentleman so rashly committed himself when addressing the electors of Newcastle-under-Lyme yesterday. It is the hon. Gentleman's equivalent of the Humber bridge. I suppose that we might be grateful that it was not even more expensive.

Of course, the loss of revenue——

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Tell us what you are doing.

Mr. Major: I am responding to the debate.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda) rose——

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend the Minister of State set out what we are doing. It is my responsibility and my intention to respond to the debate, if the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) will listen.

The loss of revenue is apparently to be financed by pouring back what the hon. Member for Oldham, West offensively calls in his motion "tax hand-outs to the most privileged sections of society."

That pot of gold, which the hon. Gentleman treats as if it were two loaves and five fishes because he is always extending it, will need to stretch to infinity as the hon. Gentleman has already spent very nearly £6 billion of the £3·6 billion he is referring to.

The hon. Gentleman's proposals to increase pensions, child benefit and the long-term scale rate for the unemployed amount to £4·6 billion. The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) tried to wriggle, but the figures are clearly set out in Hansard. When the hon. Gentleman and his advisers crawl over them, they will find that our costings are right.

If other benefits, which are presently at the same level as retirement pension—widows benefit and invalidity benefit—were to be increased by the same amount the cost would rise to £5·6 billion or thereabouts. Of course, abolishing the yield from prescription charges, when and if the hon. Gentleman does it, adds another £135 million.

The hon. Gentleman will have to look much further than the tax clawback to fund all that. The hon. Member for Derby, South rallied strongly. However, she did not rally strongly enough to cover the gaping gap of about £2 billion.

The point to which the hon. Member for Oldham, West did not refer, which was put to him clearly by my hon.

Friend the Minister, is that unless the means—tested benefits levels are increased in line, the effect of a large increase in retirement pension would be to float large numbers of people off supplementary benefit and housing benefit. They would then gain little in cash terms from the hon. Gentleman's proposal. His spending propositions would benefit the better-off pensioners and not the poorest pensioners. Therefore, unless he is prepared to accept the realistic assumption that we set out—he may wish to study it at leisure—he will see that he is not benefiting those to whom he has held himself out as a benefactor.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy), speaking for the Social Democratic part of the alliance — the hon. Member for the Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) was keeping a close eye on him but he has fled since the hon. Gentleman sat down — referred to the death grant. The Social Democratic party's proposals, as set out in an amendment in the other place, are to pay a death grant automatically. According to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye, it would be £250. According to his noble Friend Lord Kilmarnock, it would be paid at rates to be set in regulations which may differ for different geographical areas. The noble Lord appears intent on reinventing the death grant equivalent of exceptionally severe weather payments.

The essence of the point is that the hon. Gentleman said quite clearly that our propositions on the death grant were ill defined. That is not so and the hon. Gentleman will see that clearly if he studies the position. We propose that funeral expenses will be available from the social fund automatically to people on income-related benefits and will be paid quickly and, equally important, without intrusion or means testing at the time of death. That may have been a surprise to the hon. Gentleman's colleagues in another place, but it has been our proposition since the time of the Green Paper.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye also referred to the community charge, the 20 per cent. contribution in rates and the Government's position on that. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman genuinely expected me to respond at length upon that subject tonight. I am pleased to tell him that he was entirely right. I have no intention of disappointing him. He must be patient on that point for a little longer.

Mr. Kennedy rose——

Mr. Major: I will not give way because there are many points still to be covered.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) raised the question of the level of contribution flowing into the private sector pension provision which he felt was insufficient. I am aware of my hon. Friend's interest and persistence in this area of occupational pensions. I must remind him, however, that we tackled the early-leaver problem by tackling transfer arrangements. I am sure that he will recognise that and I know that he would wish us to go further, but he would be wise to see how the transfer regulations, which came into effect only on 1 January, work out in practice. I give him the assurance that we shall review the regulations carefully in the light of our proposals. I hope that he will welcome that.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow raised a number of important issues on dental care and respite charges. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said from a sedentary position that we would consider the issues and write to the hon. Gentleman. I undertake to do that at an early date.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow raised a further point, and a critical one in terms of the debate. He referred to the number of pensioners for whom we will need to care in future. In doing so, he asked for figures. I shall write to him with more detailed figures, but at present we have 9·5 million pensioners and we shall have 9·8 million in 1995. There will be 10 million in 2005 and 11·1 million in 2015. Even more critical is the fact that the age profile of pensioners is becoming higher all the time. Between 1981 and 2011 the growth in the number of pensioners aged 65 and above will be 7 per cent. It will be 24·6 per cent. for those aged 75 and above and 96·3 per cent. for those aged 85 and above. That is a staggering problem for us to deal with in future.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) raised a specific and distressing problem that is faced by one of his constituents. I shall be happy to examine the case urgently. I shall write to him, or see him to discuss the matter, as soon as I possibly can.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) referred to the greater certainty of the uprating mechanism. I agree with her that it is a material advantage to what it followed. The lottery of the forecast method that we have endured was inaccurate five years out of seven and clearly unsatisfactory.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) observed correctly that spending on the National Health Service has risen year upon year. He referred specifically to the capital building programme, which was decimated when the hon. Member for Oldham, West was a member of the previous Labour Government. The programme has been improved substantially in recent years and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is determined that it will continue to be improved. About £2,000 a minute is spent on capital expenditure on the NHS day in and day out.

A considerable amount has been said in recent months about the increase in the single person's pension. There is nothing novel about uprating being linked to price movement. The contraction of inflation is of immense value to everyone. Above all perhaps, it is of immense value to those who are on fixed incomes or relatively low incomes, as are many pensioners. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State has said, the 40p increase is an interim measure as we move the date of uprating from November to April so that it coincides each year with tax and budgetary changes. I doubt whether there is one hon. Member who has not at some time been asked why pensioners must wait six months for their increase when tax changes occur swiftly. That is one of the principal reasons for seeking to align the dates. The move should be a matter of welcome and nothing else.

When the inflation measurement fell to 1·1 per cent., there were three options—pay nothing, pay more, or pay inflation proofing. We thought that the last option was right, and it was what was anticipated. It costs over £400 million in a full year, and it follows a 7 per cent. increase last November that cost about £2 billion. The increase was well above the inflation rate at that time. It precedes a further uprating announcement that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make in the autumn. The counterpoint to this modest cash increase is the level of price restraint, which is critical.

It may be thought from what I have said that the Opposition's motion has little merit. I believe that it has no merit. It puts in what was better left out and it leaves out what was better left in. There is no mention whatever of the improved benefits or of the virtues of low inflation. There is no acknowledgement of the services that remain free to supplementary pensioners and no recognition of the growth of personal social services. There is no reference to the rising number of district nurses, home helps, geriatricians and others. The motion is stuffed with assertion. The Government's record is——

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House congratulates Her Majesty's Government on its achievement in increasing the purchasing power of the national insurance retirement pension during a period when the number of pensioners has risen by nearly a million; endorses the Government's firm commitment fully to protect pensioners against rising prices; welcomes the continued development of health and community services for the elderly; recognises the Government's outstanding success in reducing the rise in prices to the lowest level for nearly twenty years; and notes that security in retirement would be the first casualty of the renewed and rapid inflation which would flow from the expenditure and taxation policies advocated by Her Majesty's Opposition.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the British Council and Commonwealth Institute Superannuation Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Mather.]

Pesticides

10.28 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): I beg to move,

That the draft Control of Pesticide Regulations 1986, which were laid before this House on 3 July, be approved.

These regulations implement the powers in section 16(2) of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985. They have been drafted after extensive consultations with all the interests affected. Hon. Members will know that my Department, on behalf of the six Departments responsible for these regulations, issued a consultative document in November last year. Nearly 1,500 copies were sent out by my officials to interested groups and individuals. They also met many representative organisations. These draft regulations are the combined result of the expressed wishes of Parliament and of those consultations.

I shall now describe the main features of the draft regulations and explain at what date they come into operation.

Draft regulation 3, which comes into operation on 6 October, covers the pesticides to be controlled. Broadly speaking, they are the same as currently covered by the pesticides safety precautions scheme: pesticides used in agriculture, horticulture, forestry, food storage, public health and hygiene, wood preservation and masonry treatment. From 1 July 1987, this scope will be expanded to include antifouling paints. This is a major departure and one which I hope will be welcome to all who are concerned for the quality of the marine environment.

Draft regulation 4 prohibits the advertisement, sale, supply, storage and use of pesticides unless the pesticides have been approved under regulation 5 and a consent to the activity concerned has been made under regulation 6 and any condition of the approval and the consent have been complied with. I should like to stress this difference between approvals and consents. Approvals relate to the pesticides themselves. Consents relate to the activities of advertising, selling, using, and so on.

All these prohibitions will come into force on 6 October except for the first on advertising, which will come into force on 1 January 1987. This will allow companies time to modify their advertisements in the ways specified in schedule 1, which I shall explain shortly. Paragraph (5)(b)(i) of this draft regulation will also not come into force until 1 January 1988 and again, I shall explain this when I deal with use of pesticides.

Draft regulation 5, which will come into force on 6 October 1986 provides the essential features for the approval of pesticides. A notable improvement on the old arrangements is the move from the four to a three-phase approval system. This will bring us into line with the majority of registration procedures operating abroad and more importantly will do much more to facilitate enforcement. Another important new feature is the introduction of a system of automatic review of approved products, the intention of which is to ensure that approvals will not be reliant on data which do not meet modern standards.

I am pleased that, thanks in no small part to the co-operation given by the industry, and particularly the National Farmers Union, we have been able to develop a system for encompassing within the approval arrangements what were previously fringe uses of pesticides, not controlled by the pesticides safety precautions scheme. This will be achieved by providing access to the approvals procedure for the growers of so called minor crops so that safe uses of pesticides on these crops, which for reasons of crop liability manufacturers are not able to recommend, may be approved as off-label use.

Draft regulation 6 must be read together with schedules 1 to 4 to the regulations. It is in these parts of the statutory instruments that we have set out as fully as possible the general controls which we wish to impose on activities relating to pesticides. This is in contrast to the approvals system, which will provide the specific controls on each approved pesticide.

Regulation 6*(a)* and schedule 1 relate to advertisement. As with the prohibition on advertising, this consent and its conditions will come into force on 1 January 1987. So that all users of pesticides are fully informed of any risks associated with their use, manufacturers will be required to state in all advertisements the common names of the pesticidal ingredients and any specific warnings related to human health or the environment which are thought necessary by the Advisory Committee on Pesticides in its assessment.

Draft regulation 6*(b)* and schedule 2 relate to sale, supply and storage. Ministers' consent to these activities will be given on 6 October and be subject to the general obligation in paragraph 1(1) of schedule 2. Paragraph 1(2) will not apply until 1 January 1987 and this will be specified in the consent.

We propose the introduction of statutory support for standards of pesticide storage and the competence of all those who sell or store pesticides. This proceeds from the recommendation made by the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution in 1979 and recognises the considerable work already done by organisations such as the British Agricultural Standards, Inspection Scheme, in achieving high standards through self-regulation. Where possible we have built on these foundations.

Everyone engaged in the storage, sale or supply of professional pesticides will, in future, be obliged to take all reasonable precautions to protect human health and the environment and to be competent for the job they do.

We recognise that the nature and use of agricultural pesticides is perceived as posing a greater potential hazard to people — both as users or consumers — and the environment than other pesticides. The regulations accordingly contain a more detailed prescription, for certification of competence which must be obtained by those who store, sell or supply agricultural pesticides.

Draft regulation 6*(c)* and schedules 3 and 4 relate to use of pesticides, including aerial application. The consent on use will be made on 6 October and it will be subject to the conditions listed in both schedules 3 and 4. But I must stress that not all these conditions will come into force in October this year.

Paragraph 1 of schedule 3 provides a general obligation on all users of pesticides to take all reasonable precautions to protect the health of human beings, creatures and plants and to safeguard the environment. Paragraph 4 requires all those who use pesticides in the course of their business to be competent and to have received adequate instruction and guidance in the safe, efficient and humane use of pesticides. These general obligations will come into force in October.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): In paragraph 1 there is a requirement that people should take all reasonable precautions. One problem is that over the past 30 years manufacturers have produced all kinds of new pesticides, but the technology whereby the pesticide is dispensed through the spray nozzle has not changed. Are the reasonable precautions to require that the spray nozzles will be improved as well?

Mrs. Fenner: Yes, indeed. If I may develop my explanation, calibration and the availability to consider new techniques will be covered. So there will be a constant updating of new techniques under the regulations.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): My hon. Friend referred to persons using pesticides having adequate instruction. Will she confirm that those who will police the regulations will themselves have had sufficient instruction to be able to monitor them? As she will know, there is concern that although there is an obligation on the user to be adequately trained, there is not the same obligation on those who will carry out inspections through the Health and Safety Commission and other bodies. Perhaps my hon. Friend will comment on that.

Mrs. Fenner: We shall see that those operating through ADAS are certificated to the standard that we expect under the regulations.

From 1 January 1988, users will have to comply with the conditions of approval of the particular pesticide they are using, for example, any specified maximum dose rate or minimum time between use and harvest. Paragraphs 5 and 6 require contractors, including aerial sprayers, and persons under the age of 25 on 1 January 1989 who use agricultural pesticides to obtain recognised certificates of competence unless they are working under the direct and personal supervision of a certificate holder. These conditions will not come into force until 1 January 1989. From the same date there will be specific controls on the mixing of two or more pesticides — paragraph 2 of schedule 3—and the use of pesticides with adjuvants—paragraph 3.

I know that there has been some misunderstanding and hence concern about paragraph 3 of schedule 3 to our draft regulations. At present the more responsible adjuvant manufacturers notify their adjuvants to our Harpenden laboratory and they are cleared through the PSPS, including agreement on label recommendations and warnings, as though they were pesticides. Clearly we cannot continue to operate in this way under the regulations because adjuvants do not fall within the definition of pesticides in the Act. However, what we intend to do is continue to evaluate adjuvants notified to us and to publish a list of adjuvants which we have found to be suitable for use with approved pesticides. The conditions of approval of a pesticide referred to in paragraph 3 of schedule 3 will then include something to the effect that this pesticide may only be mixed with adjuvants which appear on the MAFF list and provided the conditions of use on the adjuvant label are complied with.

Users will not therefore be restricted to using only the adjuvants which appear on the pesticide label but will be free to use any from the MAFF list, provided there is no restriction or contra-indication on the adjuvant label.

Agricultural departments have recently issued a draft code of practice on the agricultural and horticultural use of pesticides for public comment and discussions. Copies were made available, both in this House and in the other place, on Monday. [Interruption.] The code would be made under section 17 of the Act and has as its purpose the provision of practical guidance to agricultural and horticultural users of pesticides as to how they can comply with the obligations imposed by the regulations. [Interruption.]

Mr. John Carlisle: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is very difficult on this side of the House to hear what my hon. Friend the Minister is saying because of the incessant chatter on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I am anxious to hear the debate, too. Conversations should take place outside the Chamber.

Mrs. Fenner: I am obliged, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I know that in Committee hon. Members felt very strongly that as it was an enabling Bill there should be an opportunity to hear about the regulations. I hope that they will be patient while I try fully to cover them.

The draft code will eventually be laid before Parliament for approval, after the content of the draft has been considered and revised in the light of consultation and practical experience.

There have been many discussions on our proposals for controls over users of pesticides since they were published last year. They have met with general agreement and we have, I believe, a package which will raise standards and ensure the progressive establishment of a trained and competent work force. In this we have considered the needs of the industry and chosen a timetable for introduction that will not impose excessive burdens on costs.

There is general agreement that it is important that farmers keep records of pesticide use. Indeed, it is only common sense that for a farmer to use pesticides efficiently he should keep a record of what he has done. Records are also useful in identifying pollution problems. Farmers should not be concerned that in such cases their records would be used against them. On the contrary, if they have acted properly they will have nothing to fear, but their records could provide an indication that the approved conditions of use for a pesticide may need to be reviewed. For these reasons, the need to keep records has been strongly emphasised in the draft code of practice which supports the regulations. It was not thought necessary at this time to make record-keeping a statutory requirement. If, however, a farmer were to use pesticides irresponsibly and he did not keep records, he could be subject to a notice requiring him to keep records in future. Non-compliance with that notice would be an offence.

I can assure the House that if this non-statutory approach is not seen to be working well—if farmers do not keep appropriate records — there will be no hesitation about introducing a statutory requirement.

As I said, the consent on use will also be subject to the conditions set out in schedule 4 on aerial application. These repeat, in the main, the existing requirements already imposed on aerial operators by the Air Navigation Order 1985. They will all come into operation on 6 October this year.

Briefly, no one can apply a pesticide from the air unless he holds an aerial application certificate granted by the Civil Aviation Authority and there are controls on operators relating to the advance notification of operations, the provision of warnings to passers-by, the conditions under which operations may be undertaken, the keeping of safe distances from surrounding property, the avoidance of spray drift and the keeping of records. Advance notification of operations has to be given to the Nature Conservancy Council, water authorities, the Chief Environmental Health Officer, neighbours, hospitals, schools or other institutions and to local beekeepers where there is a local spray warning scheme. Where appropriate, the agreement of the water authority must be obtained. A maximum wind speed for operations is prescribed and ground markers are required where necessary. Pilots of aircraft carrying out spraying operations must maintain a minimum height when flying over occupied buildings, gardens and roads, and they must maintain a mimimum horizontal distance from occupied buildings and their gardens, playgrounds, sports ground or buildings containing livestock and they must contain the pesticide to the land intended to be treated. [Interruption.] The draft code of practice of the agricultural and horticultural use of pesticides will provide guidance on the measurement of wind speed, prevention of spray drift, the advance warning of operations, warning signs to be displayed and the use of human ground markers.

Hon. Members will be aware that paragraph 2*(a)* of schedule 4, which relates to prior consultations with the Nature Conservancy Council where aerial operations are within three quarters of a nautical mile of a site of special scientific interest, does not quite reflect our intentions because there is an omission. The paragraph refers to section 29(1) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, which relates to a small number of SSSIs where the Secretary of State has made an order. But the remaining SSSIs and national nature reserves are covered by section 28 of the Act. That is an omission and it is our intention to make use of the power granted by regulation 6*(c)*(ii) of these regulations to include as a condition of the consent to the use of pesticides for aerial application that prior consultations are also required in relation to SSSIs covered by section 28. Thus [Interruption.] prior consultation with the NCC will be required for all SSSIs and national nature reserves within three quarters of one nautical mile of operations.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): As I recollect matters, there was an undertaking in a consultation paper issued by the Minister's Department that there would be a statutory requirement for consultation in the context of the NCC and sites of special scientific interest. Would it not be possible for the final regulations to be amended to include that in the obvious place rather than at three steps removed in some other way, in accordance with what I understand was the Department's original intention?

Mrs. Fenner: The Department's original intention is also fully covered in the requirement—[Interruption.]—referring to section 29(1). We wish to ensure that that level of concentration also applies to those SSSIs and nature reserves covered by section 28 of the Act — [Interruption.] We are not making provision at three steps removed, we will make use of the power granted to us to introduce it in the way that I have described.

One issue that I must mention before I conclude is disclosure of information, which is the subject of draft regulation 8. From both sides of the House and from all quarters there have been increasing and ever-louder calls for greater disclosure of information. The Government have listened and responded. The Act under which the regulations will be made was the first piece of British legislation to be made under any Government which specifically provided for the release of information on pesticides to the public. In regulation 8 we have taken up the power provided in the Act to set out the ground rules for a disclosure of information system that will achieve that fine but essential balance between as much public access to data as possible and the need to protect from exploitation by competitors information which has a genuine and considerable commercial value — [Interruption.]

We already publish, or intend to publish, information on approvals granted, reviews to be carried out and their results, the results of our monitoring work on usage patterns, residue levels and wildlife effects, and the annual reports of the advisory committee. Under regulation 8, we shall make available our detailed evaluations of all the toxicity, environmental, efficacy and other test data on a pesticide as it receives provisional approval. Where a genuine query remains unanswered by the evaluation, we shall grant access to the study reports on which the evaluation is based. Before making available an evaluation, and still more before providing access to study reports, we shall do everything possible to ensure that the inquirer understands that if he publishes without permission or makes commercial use of the data, he will be committing a criminal offence under the Act.

That triple thread——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Triple thread?

Mrs. Fenner: —of published reports, availability of detailed evaluations and access to study reports is a sound and workable procedure which will provide the public with much useful information. The system will place the United Kingdom in the vanguard of authorities that are responding to the appeals for greater openness, and should be welcomed by the noisy Opposition as such.

I commend the draft regulations to the House.

10.52 pm

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): I was extremely disturbed by the Minister's speech, particularly because the Standing Committee that considered the Food and Environment Protection Bill of 1985 debated matters without strict party differences to try to produce the best legislation that it could. It was one of those rare Bills. Therefore, it is sickening for me to have to observe that the Committee was misguided and misled by the Government in those debates, and that we wasted our time on matters in which the Government have no serious interest and to which they are not deeply committed.

The Opposition will oppose the regulations. They do not deserve the approval of the House, and we shall try to ensure that they do not obtain it. That is not because we do not believe in effective pesticide regulations, but because these regulations will not be effective — [Interruption.] The Minister complained about noise. I should be grateful if she would obey her own strictures.

Some of our objections overlap in practice, but I shall set out the broad groups of objection. The first is the way in which the regulations were framed. The second is the probity of Ministers in introducing them in this form. The third is the obvious ways in which the regulations weaken existing protection, and the fourth is the fact that they omit matters that the discussion documents said would be included.

First, may I deal with the form of the regulations. In our debates in Committee, hon. Members on both sides pointed out the excessively general nature of the Bill's provisions. We were told that we should not worry, because the Bill was not an appropriate vehicle—to coin civil servants' jargon. We were told to wait for the detailed regulations; that would be the time to debate the matter and all our detailed queries would be answered. Here they are before us, but they do not include those or any other details. They are almost as general as the Act itself and just about as vague. Now, apparently, we have to wait for advertisements which are to be placed in the London Gazette and the Edinburgh Gazette, not to see what they propose for specific pesticides, as the consultative document said, but for the general controls themselves.

The Minister skirted over her part in Committee, particularly the ministerial assurances which she gave. For example, on 2 April, in columns 178-79 of Hansard, we were told that the details we then wanted to discuss were unsuitable for the Committee but that we would have plenty of time to do that when the regulations came along.

The regulations are no more precise than the Act itself and we have to wait for a further stage, not secondary legislation, but tertiary legislation, legislation by advertisement, not for, I repeat, one pesticide, but for general conditions for all pesticides, such as training in its use. Not only were we misled in Committee, but the regulations are now being framed in such a form — by adverts advertising them in the London Gazette and the Edinburgh Gazette—which will mean that many details of pesticide use will never be debated in the House, nor will they ever be subject to the scrutiny of the House.

Given the national interest in this subject, that is a disgrace. We are told, and I am sure the Minister will say the same, that that is just a matter of judgment and of differing views between the parties. But even granting the differing views upon their nature, it is impossible upon the working of the regulations to tell what sort of controls we shall end up with.

It is true that the schedule gives us some sketchy details of what the conditions might comprise, but it is equally true that they might not comprise them, because, as I read it, the Minister is under no statutory obligation to include all the points in the schedule in the final conditions which are imposed.

At the same time, by an ingenious piece of drafting, other points which are not in the schedule at the moment can be included in the advertisement. So what use are the regulations? I suggest that they are no use at all except to enable the Government to claim that they are observing the proprieties while keeping Parliament firmly shut out on the substance of the debate. In what may sound a harsh judgment, particularly of the Parliamentary Secretary, I said that I believed that ministerial probity was involved. I have already given one instance when we were assured that details would be debated on the regulations rather than on the Bill. Now we know that that is not so.

Let me give some other instances. On 16 April, as part of the same Committee stage, when discussing labelling and pesticide containers, we were told by the Minister that the regulations would contain details on those subjects. Indeed, she gave an absolute assurance that labels would be dealt with in the regulations. Neither matter is even mentioned in the regulations. What price ministerial assurances now?

But even more serious is the question of enforcement. We all know—we recognised it when we debated this—that enforcement was the key to the effectiveness of the regulations. We also know from the Institution of Professional Civil Servants that routine inspections of family farms, as opposed to farms which employ labour, can now be expected only every 30 years. I repeat—30 years. It was always anticipated that without additional inspectors enforcement of the regulations would be ineffective.

On 26 June on Report, the Minister assured us that "there will be 12 additional inspectors."—[Official Report, 26 June 1985; Vol. 81, c. 959.]

We now know, from the evidence of the Health and Safety Executive to the Select Committee on Agriculture, that there will not be any additional inspectors. This catalogue makes me wonder what ministerial assurances on this Bill are worth. Such a cavalier attitude does not do the Ministry any credit, and that alone merits our dividing the House.

I shall now consider the weakness of the regulations compared with what we were promised would happen. Chief among them, although the hon. Lady did not mention it in her long comments on aerial spraying is the gross weakening of the protection afforded to sites of special scientific interest. The Committee was anxious about aerial spraying but was somewhat mollified when we were told not to be too worried as regulations and statutory control would replace the air navigation orders. Those orders require notification of a proposal to spray aerially within three quarters of a nautical mile of an SSSI. We were astounded to learn that, in the regulations, that provision is limited to SSSIs which are the subject of a section 29 order, which is appropriately made against an awkward landowner. I can illustrate how exceptional such orders are by saying that fewer then 20—I believe that it is fewer then 15 — such orders have been made, although there are 5,000 SSSIs.

Despite the hon. Lady's protestations, as the regulations stand, protection is being removed from the overwhelming majority of SSSIs. All that they have is a promise, the keeping of which is not debatable in the House, to use an advertisement. She may be trying to create a run on the London Gazette, but she is certainly not creating a flood of hon. Members coming into the Chamber to debate the regulations. This is the right place in which to debate them. If, as the hon. Lady said, she meant to include all sites to which section 28 applies, it is a sad commentary of the extensive consultation which she said that she did and on the extensive adoption of the suggestions that she got the wrong section in the regulations.

The regulations are materially defective. They should be taken away, given back to the draftsmen and brought back in a more acceptable form. Anybody would have thought that this was a joke or a mistake. If this is not a mistake, it will be a shameful betrayal of thousands of farmers who are deeply concerned about the environment.

[Mr. Brynmor John]

That is but one example of how control is being weakened. Another concerns the provision of training. We all agree that it is vital, when handling a toxic substance such as a pesticide, to be properly trained. That was common ground in Committee. Our assent was therefore strained to breaking point when the regulations became known. They provide that only people who will be under 25 in 1989 will have to be trained before they can apply pesticides. With normal retirement dates, that means that it will be 40 years before everyone who handles pesticides will be covered by the regulations. I have heard of phased introduction, but that it taking it to absurd lengths. A qualified work force is important.

I shall now consider the omissions. The Committee favoured most strongly the minimum of pesticides being applied with the maximum accuracy. There was agreement about that.

I understand that discussions on these regulations have featured a procedure of parallel approvement whereby adjuvents for example, would be approved separately and brought into effect with pesticides. One example of adjuvents is vegetable oil, which not only makes lower quantities of pesticide more effective, but cuts the risk of spray drift. I remember spending many happy hours in Committee on the problem of spray drift.

The approval procedure is not part of the regulations. We are not told that it will be produced in some amorphous form, which I cannot pretend to understand from the Minister's explanation, and will somehow be all right. The omission of the provision about adjuvents from the regulations has led the United Kingdom Agricultural Supply Trade Association, the Agricultural Engineers Association and companies involved to believe that pesticide manufacturers have been given an effective veto on what substances may be used with their pesticides and what means of application, such as controlled droplet application, can be used. If that is so, and it seems that it is, I believe it to be contrary to public policy.

It is true that we got another absolute assurance from the Minister that such techniques would be neither explicitly nor implicitly banned. I shall want a great deal of convincing, of the vagueness of the Minister's speech tonight, before I believe that this is not another example of a broken promise given to the Committee.

Again, head 8 of the possible heads of proposals mentions a list of all approved pesticides. It is similar to one currently to be found by farmers and other people in agriculture to be very useful. It is a booklet in which one can find all the approved pesticides. However, although it was in the heads of proposals under the consultation procedure, it is nowhere to be found in this regulation. Also, there are no references to include the training of advisers, which was in the consultation procedure, or the regulation of storage and the transportation of pesticides.

This is a typically slipshod effort at legislating by a know-nothing and care-nothing Department. The gaps and deficiencies in the regulations mean that they should be withdrawn and redrafted. Of course, we know that that will not happen because the Government pay no heed to advice they get from concerned people. We shall vote against these regulations, not because we are against pesticide control, but because this attempt falls so short of pesticide control that it devalues the subject and insults the feeling of genuine concern of many thousands of people.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I do not share the disappointment of the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) over what my hon. Friend has said. I was on the Standing Committee with the hon. Gentleman and a number of other Members in the Chamber and, as I understood it, one of the main things that the Minister said in the long debates we had was that she would tighten up on aerial spraying. In schedule 4 we have quite a detailed, and, to my view, satisfactory calendar of events which any aerial operator has to follow in the future. I would say that schedule 4 is well worth a try.

I do not share the bogus disappointment which the hon. Member for Pontypridd has, in a typical way, expressed from the Opposition Front Bench. We were promised by the Minister, I distinctly remember, that we would get regulations. We have only one hour and a half on this. The Whips have already been round asking us to speak for two minutes or less. We were promised a whole flow of regulations. I regard this as the first of a family. I think that the hon. Member for Pontypridd will not be disappointed when the Minister says that this is the first of the regulations which will flow from the mass of work that we all shared in Committee. As such he should not be so churlish as to speak about it in the way that he has.

I recognise that it is impossible in a debate lasting one and a half hours to include all the undertakings that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary gave in Committee. I recall, however, that during our debates on aerial spraying, during which the hon. Member for Pontypridd talked about spray drift, my hon. Friend said that she recognised that some products could change their character completely within a few months. It is unfortunate that we have nothing in the regulations about products that can change substantially in character after 12 months and become either dangerous or harmless, or have an entirely different effect from that which they had originally. I hope that a statement to that effect will be included in the next set of regulations to come forward.

There was quite a substantial debate on that issue in Committee, and if my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary refers to the Hansard reports of the proceedings, if she has time to do so, she will find that she undertook to consider the issue.

As the hon. Member for Pontypridd has said, the Committee which considered the Bill, as it then was, was a good one in that we tried to confine ourselves to issues of common sense. We discussed carefully misleading advertisements of products that are quite effective in dealing with a certain problem but which have harmful by-effects. We had long debates about a product called Kestrel, to which the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) drew attention. It is a German chemical which has dangerous effects on wildlife. General anxiety was expressed by Members on both sides of the Committee about the need to tighten up on regulations that apply to misleading advertisements and the provision of inadequate warnings. I would hope that we have before us the first of a family of regulations that will flow from my hon. Friend the Minister.

Schedule 3 sets out eight sensible conditions subject to which consent to the use of pesticides may be given. There is reference to proper training. The third condition states:

"No person shall use a pesticide in conjunction with an adjuvant except in accordance with the conditions".

There is reference also to a person's training, which is so important. An omission, which I hope will be put right, is a requirement that should be placed upon machinery manufacturers. It should be possible for all spray operators to gain access to spraying controls without leaving their closed tractor cab. That is something that is recognised by good tractor manufacturers and suppliers which offer sealed safety cabs. The controls are placed inside the cab, but only because the manufacturers think that that is a good idea. In fact, it is essential to the comfort, health and safety of the operator that they are. He should not have to leave his cab when he wants to turn the sprayer off and risk inhaling outside air which could be contaminated. I would ask my hon. Friend the Minister to take a greater interest in practicalities and introduce a requirement, in conjunction with machinery and tractor manufacturers, that at an early date all new tractors must have all spraying controls inside a sealed cab so as to protect the operator by making it unnecessary to leave the cab and risk inhaling outside air in what could be a temporarily polluted environment.

In expressing disappointment yet great hope and confidence in my hon. Friend the Minister — she has never let me down over many years — I welcome the regulations.

11.14 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I have less hope and confidence than the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr). My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) has pointed out to me that it is significant that whereas the Liberal and Labour parties have agricultural and environmental spokesmen in the Chamber, no Minister from the Department of the Environment is present on the Front Bench. [Interruption.] There is only an Agriculture Minister. There is nobody from the Department of the Environment. [Interruption.] The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry, the hon. Member for Medway (Mrs. Fenner), have been present. If the Government are to make a commitment to reconcile, properly, the interests of agriculture and the environment, it might be just about possible for one Minister from the six at the Department of the Environment to manage to be present for an hour and a half at the end of an evening.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: No. I will not give way.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a very short debate. Perhaps we can return to the regulations under consideration.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hughes: No. I am not giving way.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold), was present until about two or three minutes ago when she left the Chamber. It is grossly unfair that an hon. Member should refuse to give way when he has made an attack of that sort.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It may be unfair, but it is not a matter for me. Let us get on with the debate.

Mr. Hughes: When the legislation went through the House it was clear that regulations were to be expected, and my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) and I said that the sooner we got them, the better. We now have the regulations, and that is to be welcomed, because the Bill was without substance until they came before the House. If the Government were truly minded to honour the commitments made in Committee, on Report and on Third Reading, the ideal way to proceed would be to introduce their proposals and, in the light of a debate in the House, to take them away, improve them and bring them back in a generally acceptable form. The fact that they have not done so is to be regretted.

As the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) made clear, there is concern that whereas in the draft consultation document it was clearly anticipated that the Government would deal with sites of special scientific interest, somehow — the Minister said "by mistake" — they were omitted. I cannot believe that with a whole Department of Civil Servants such a substantial mistake can be made on a matter coming before the House. It must give some cause for suspicion that the Government have no real commitment, unless in the reply the Government can say that all the SSSIs will be protected as they anticipated in the MAFF consultation paper of November 1985.

It is not clear whether the regulations, especially those relating to training, also apply to independent advisers and consultants. Clearly, they apply to the industry, but at various stages of the principal legislation the anxiety was expressed that the controls related to agricultural pesticides, but not to non-agricultural pesticides and those using them in a different context, as advisers and consultants. If the Minister's Parliamentary Private Secretary reappears, I would be grateful if the Minister could be given an answer to that question.

It is not clear whether the scope of the regulations extends beyond the agricultural sector. It was intended that it should. I hope that the Minister can give an undertaking that the regulations cover all use of pesticides by whomsoever it may be, and are not limited to one sector.

There is concern among the trade associations that they were not adequately consulted. I hope that the Minister has taken note of that concern — people were led to believe that they would have a more substantial period of consultation.

The hon. Member for Pontypridd made a comment that I would endorse—that simply and scientifically it is wrong to suggest, as is done in schedule 3, paragraph (2), that one can include both tank mixes and adjuvants in the same context in the regulations. That is not the way in which the industry deals with the matter, and it would have been far better to have separated them.

I wish briefly to make two final points. The Minister said little about resources for enforcement. If we agree that there should be regulations, and that they should be made soon after the Act, it is clear that they are no good unless people are available to enforce them. The one without the other is of no use to anyone. The Minister did not make any substantial commitment to that in her speech.

[Mr. Hughes]

Secondly, it must be apparent to everyone that with the method that the Government have now chosen, the crucial stage will lie with the granting or withholding of licences. We are putting back the day and the way in which the law becomes effective. My hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North, who served on the Committee, and my hon. Friend for Brecon and Radnor, who speaks for my party on agricultural matters, clearly want regulations. My concern is that the Government did not take into account what we and other hon. Members said in Committee. Perhaps more important they did not honour all the things that they said they would before they brought the regulations to the House.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): This matter greatly concerns my part of East Anglia, where aerial spraying is common and the use of pesticides essential to our farming industry. Last night I spoke on an environmental matter that touched upon East Anglia, and ended up with a result quite different from the one that I had hoped to achieve. However, tonight we are fortunate enough to have present two members of the Whip's Office who will at least ensure that, whoever wins the argument, we will win the vote.

I was impressed by the arguments of the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John). His views, although perhaps overstated, coincided with much of the advice that I have received. It was while I was in the Department of the Environment as a junior Minister that the Royal Commission on environmental pollution was established. As one of its founding fathers, I have always regarded it with the utmost seriousness. When I read its 1979 report, which dealt with aerial spraying, I thought that the time had come to deal with that matter.

The Opposition spokesman was a little grudging in his remarks, because at least the Government have tackled the problem that their predecessors did not. It is a matter for congratulation that this Government have at least done something about pesticides, while Opposition Members have talked about it but achieved nothing. That having been said, I must say that I am not happy with— [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who has already made his speech, wants to intervene. I must tell him pointedly that he is badly dressed, badly informed and bad-mannered. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment was here, listened to the two Front Benches, excused herself, as must happen in this Chamber from time to time, and is almost certainly going to return. It was wrong of the hon. Gentleman quite typically to asperse her—especially as he is, I repeat, bad-mannered, badly informed and badly dressed.

I come now to the matter on which I find myself in considerable agreement with the Opposition. I have been advised by those involved in CDA—controlled droplet application — sprays in my constituency that these regulations are defective in some parts. When one of my constituents wrote to me and complained about the regulations and claimed that they would destroy his company, I said that I needed more evidence than that of an interested party. He obtained for me the advice of a gentleman, Mr. R. J. Makepeace, who is an expert in the field. I shall not go into his details in view of the shortage of time. Mr. Makepeace said:

"When I read this"— paragraph 3 of schedule 3—

"this confirmed my worst suspicions that this Act would . . . give a charter for the major international agrochem manufacturers to restrict development and special applications of adjuvants in the United Kingdom. On reading schedule 3 I immediately came to the conclusion that one could not use an adjuvant, except in accordance with the conditions of the approval given in relation to that pesticide and, as already stated by the minister the pesticide would, in fact, be a label from a manufacturer. If, therefore, that label did not care to mention an adjuvant then none could be used with it. This is particularly bad when one looks at a product such as Betanal E"— he then mentioned the manufacturer, which was a non-British-owned company—

"where they make no recommendations for any adjuvant at all, not even their own adjuvant oil, and yet this market would not exist without adjuvants and indeed the British Sugar Corporation recommend every post-emergent herbicide be used with an adjuvant."

The schedule does not deal with that. When I brought that to the attention of my hon. Friend, she courteously and diligently considered the matter. She wrote to me on 16 July. I need not read all the letter, because she used the same words tonight. The essence of what she said was:

"Clearly we cannot continue to operate in this way under the regulations because adjuvants do not fall within the definition of pesticides in the Act."

Then came the immortal words:

"However, what we intend to do is to continue to evaluate adjuvants notified to us and to publish a list of adjuvants which we have found to be suitable for use with approved pesticides."

That is something that she intends to do. Yet, she is asking the House to approve it. It is not a question of what she intends to do. I want to know what she has done so far. She continued:

"The conditions of approval of a pesticide referred to in paragraph 3 of Schedule 3 will then include"—

I ask the House to mark the words—

"something to the effect that this pesticide may only be used with adjuvants which appear on the MAFF list."

What on earth does one mean by coming to the House of Commons and talking about "something to the effect"? We are asked to pass specific regulations that must be enforced and obeyed by everyone in the country. Yet, what we are offered is that some time in future the Ministry will work out

"something to the effect that this pesticide may only be used with adjuvants which appear on the MAFF list."

What MAFF list? There is no MAFF list in front of us tonight. It will be concocted some time in future.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the care and diligence with which she has considered the problem. The assurances she has given will go a long way to satisfying some of my constituents. I congratulate her on having tackled the problem of pesticides and on having done something that has not been done before. However, the vagueness of her letter and her speech tonight does not give me a great deal of confidence that the Ministry is tackling the problem with the rigorous, intellectual care that is required in such a matter.

The country cares that pesticides should be brought under effective control—and no group of people more than the agriculture industry. The better farmer is deeply concerned. But he must have something better than words saying that at some uncertain point in the future, something to the effect will be produced on a list that is not before us. That is not good legislation. It is not good enough for the House.

11.29 pm

Miss Joan Maynard (Sheffield, Brightside): The regulations, which are being laid before Parliament in accordance with the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985, do not even address all the issues identified in the consultative document. Will the matters not addressed in the regulations be addressed in future regulations? This is a matter for concern. We will not know the full extent of the protection likely to be afforded until all the regulations have been laid before Parliament. We can have no faith in that approach, given the Government's stated intention not to provide 12 more inspectors, as promised in the consultative document.

How many other matters will be conveniently left unaddressed? The regulations are controlled and run by the wrong agency — the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. It would have been better if the Department of the Environment had been in control. I believe that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has been influenced far too much by the powerful farming lobby, which has a direct interest in the use of pesticides. I wonder how much the agro-chemical industry has influenced the Ministry.

The scope of the regulations is too narrow, as outlined in regulation 3, and the exemptions in regulation 3(2) are too wide—the worst of both worlds. Regulation 4 deals with prohibitions, but there is no mention of procedures to be adopted to ensure compliance with the regulations. I believe that regulation 4 should give details of proper sampling procedures, record-keeping, and so on and the roles of the following: the Health and Safety Executive, the public analyst and the environmental health officers.

Regulation 4, which deals with information, lays down no appeals procedure when a member of the public is refused access to information. The body that makes the decision relating to pesticide clearance should not have the power of veto. There must be a formal independent appeals procedure which can be invoked when there has been a refusal to provide raw data on request.

Regulation 8(3) states:

"A copy of an evaluation or study report may be furnished by the Ministers on payment of such reasonable fees as the Ministers, with the consent of the Treasury, may determine from time to time."

I am worried about three aspects. First, the regulation states that the Ministers "may", not "will". Secondly, it refers to the payment of "such reasonable fees". The word "reasonable" could have different meanings for different people. Thirdly, the regulation refers to the "consent of the Treasury".

This is in sharp contrast to section 18 of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985, which deals with fees which "may" be payable by industry. I believe that regulation 8(3) is at best ambiguous and at worst biased against the public and in favour of industry. One side should not be obliged to pay while the other "may" have to pay.

Aerial spraying is one of the most contentious issues, yet there is no requirement under the regulations to notify the Health and Safety Executive of aerial spraying activity. Notice must be given to the chief environmental health officer for the district in which it is intended to apply pesticides. The Health and Safety Executive is the body responsible for human health and safety under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974, yet it is specifically excluded from the notification requirements of schedule 4 to the regulations. Is this another example of deregulation or a thinly disguised attempt to reduce the Health and Safety Executive's responsibilities under the Food and Envionment Protection Act to justify the refusal to provide the 12 additional inspectors originally promised?

Whatever the reasons, the exclusion of the Health and Safety Executive is wholly unacceptable. Let us look at records — again, an important matter. There is no mention of record keeping in the regulations except under schedule 4(5), dealing with aerial spraying. I believe that records must be kept in respect of all pesticide users. They need to include the following details: the length of operation, the date of first use, ill effects, suspected or confirmed, medical attention received or sought, nature of application equipment, protective clothing supplied or used. To have any real value, those records need to be kept for at least 20 years. The three-year period for record-keeping in respect of aerial spraying is far too short. That, too, should be a minimum of 20 years, as for all other records.

Let us look at the review procedure. The regulations make no reference to a review procedure in connection with pesticide approval. Pesticides should be reviewed every five years, and sooner when there is knowledge of potential or actual risks and hazards. On container design, storage and disposal, the consultative document refers to a code of practice relating to those issues. The full extent of the code is not identified, however, and no mention is made of container design. Those issues are too important to be relegated to an undetermined future code of practice, and must form part of and be covered by the regulations.

The original consultative document referred to the need "to secure safe, sufficient and humane methods of controlling pests".

No such reference is made in the regulations. Such a reference must be included in the preamble. In short, the regulations, to put it mildly, leave much to be desired. That is why we shall vote against them.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): I hope that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) will forgive me if I do not take up some of the various points that she made.

The behaviour of Opposition Members, with the honourable exceptions of the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) and for South Shields (Dr. Clark), was appalling while my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary was making her speech. This is a serious debate, which affects many people, both in and outside the industry. It was appalling that some Opposition Members, particularly the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), who has returned to the Chamber, considered that it was a matter for such levity. We spent many hours in Committee on this important subject. Perhaps it befits the Labour party that it considered it a matter for laughter and light-heartedness.

I followed with interest the remarks of the hon. Member for Pontypridd. He will know that I have much sympathy with what he said. Conservative Members admired the way in which he conducted the debate in Committee, but he will understand that I cannot go fully down the road of the extravagant language that he used in his criticism of the regulations. He is right in that there are certain deficiencies, and he is also right that there are certain matters left unsaid and perhaps certain questions unanswered. I agree with him that there must be concern that these long-awaited regulations are perhaps a disappointment to some of us.

However, I think that most hon. Members and certainly the industry and farmers will welcome the regulations. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) said, at least this Government have had the courage to bring them before the House in response to a certain amount of public pressure as well as pressure within the agriculture industry itself. For that, we should be grateful.

I should like to put three small points to my hon. Friend the Minister, on matters where there is still some concern in the industry. The first is to do with schedule 3 (2) and (3), which have already been mentioned. I should like to refer to mixing the adjuvants. If the regulations are enforced strictly according to the law it will restrict many farmers in the mixes that they can put into their own tanks. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds rightly said, if they have to keep rigidly to the manufacturers' recommendations, with certain chemicals, it will be far more costly for the farmers to use them.

One is concerned that adjuvants do not appear in the pesticide regulations. I can understand why they do not. The cost to the farming industry could be considerable, and in many cases, certain geographical and climatic conditions may mean that farmers should be able to mix and use the strengths of chemical according to their judgment at a particular time. The rigidity of these regulations would tend to restrict that. There is great concern in the industry on this matter, and any way in which my hon. Friend can look at it again, or make some further remark on it, would be welcome.

I understand that liquid fertilisers are to be considered within this part of the regulations, but they were not mentioned in Committee, and it seems as though that has been slipped in. Again, perhaps my hon. Friend can say something about that.

I mentioned my second point in an intervention in my hon. Friend's speech. It is about the advisers and inspectors. I share the concern of the hon. Member for Pontypridd about the reduced number of inspectors that has been proposed. Far be it from any Conservative Member to approve more bureaucrats, but in this case concern was expressed to members of the Select Committee when we were at Rothamsted recently that the regulations might come in without enforcement because of lack of personnel.

I am more worried that the regulations insist, possibly rightly, that those who use chemicals, and those directly involved, should have some form of training. My hon. Friend will know that in our discussions on Second Reading concern was expressed that the British agricultural standards inspection scheme, of which I know that she and my right hon. Friend the Minister are admirers, was not written into the legislation. The industry can understand how it was impossible to put that in. If strict training procedures are put on those who use the chemicals, surely, similar training must be imposed on those who inspect and have the job of making sure that the regulations are carried out. As far as I can see, there is nothing in the regulations about that.

My third point of concern is about access to information. My hon. Friend was right to express some surprise at the opposition to this measure that has come from the Opposition Benches, and particularly from the Liberal spokesman, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). I am sorry that the spokesman for the SDP is not here, but that is a matter for him, and perhaps for the Liberal party. There is concern that the greater access to information could have a damaging effect on the future of chemicals, and could put some chemicals at risk as some manufacturers find that certain information is made restricted if access to information is given.

We all appreciate that the public must be made aware of what is going on. The work of the Select Committee at the moment is on the effects of pesticides on human health. The hon. Member for Brightside is on that Committee as well, and will understand that we must try to allay public anxiety. If the regulations restrict research and development by manufacturers because too much information is to be made available, so that others can take that information and use it to their advantage it may restrict development in this sector.

In general, Conservative Members will support the regulations. We are a little surprised that the Opposition have chosen to vote against them, but I appreciate the strong feelings and the large amount of work that they, and in particular the hon. Member for Pontypridd, have done. Neither the industry nor the farming community are afraid of regulation of their activities. This may be an early step, with more to come. However, it allays fears and gives the lie to those who say that the Government are not interested in the effect of chemicals on human health. For that reason, I shall support the Government, and wish my hon. Friend well in the implementation of the regulations.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): The Committee on the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 was one of the most constructive and thoughtful Committees on which I have served. Constructive points were put forward from all sides and we thought that the Minister had taken note of them. Time after time we were told that the Department would try to accommodate the points in the regulations. Therefore, I am bitterly disappointed to see the form of the regulations. They are most inadequate, as my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) has spelt out in a devastating fashion. I hope that the Minister has listened to the tone of her hon. Friends' speeches. Although they may join her in the Division Lobby, I detected their deep concern. Almost all hon. Members who have spoken feel that the regulations are not up to par.

In the short time at my disposal I want to touch on three matters. The hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) made a pertinent point which needs clarifying. Are these the only regulations that the Government foresee bringing before us arising out of the Food and Environment Protection Act, or is the hon. Gentleman correct in assuming that other regulations will follow in the near future? We need a definitive statement on that point tonight. The hon. Member for Harborough will no doubt be listening for that answer.

Several hon. Members turned to enforcement. If the regulations are to be effective in protecting human health, agricultural workers and the environment, we need proper enforcement. I hope the Minister has heard the word from both sides of the House and the deep disappointment about the way in which she has reneged on her promise at the Report stage in this House in June to appoint 12 additional inspectors.

May I draw to the Minister's attention the evidence of the Health and Safety Executive to the Select Committee on Agriculture:

"It has not proved possible to allocate extra resources to HSE for the fresh tasks imposed by the regulations, under the FEP Act, within the constraints applying generally to civil service manpower. There are also limits to the speed with which inspectors can be recruited fully trained and experienced."

How, therefore, can the Minister assure the House that the work of enforcement under the regulations can be done effectively when already the Health and Safety Executive says that it has insufficient staff to do the job?

On the environment, as the Minister knows, the system of sites of special scientific interest covers only a small proportion of our environment. As the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) and I know, those areas are very restricted. Restrictions have been imposed because of the high scientific quality and rarity of the areas. Under the present regulations, before these come into operation, every one of the SSSIs is protected from aerial spraying. It is not good enough for the Minister to say to the House tonight, "We have made a mistake. Only 15 of the 4,500 are now protected. But do not worry. We will put it right by an advertisement in the Edinburgh Gazette and the London Gazette." The experience of the Government under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 has been that enforcement notices have been inadequate. The problem was only rectified by the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Act 1985, which I introduced as a private Member's Bill in the last Parliament. Therefore, how can we have confidence that the Government can protect the 4,500 SSSIs simply by means of an advertisement in the two capital gazettes?

I hope we have shown that the regulations are a great disappointment. They represent a breach of faith amongst those hon. Members who spent many hours constructively in Committee. The Minister has admitted that the regulations are inadequate and contain great gaps. They are not good enough to be brought before the House. Furthermore, in some instances they weaken the protection from the use of pesticides that is provided for the general public and the environment. I hope that the Minister will reconsider the regulations.

11.50 pm

Mrs. Fenner: The hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) suggested that the Government had not paid enough heed. We paid enough heed by introducing these regulations. It has been pointed out by several of my hon. Friends that previous Governments did not do so. It was a travesty for the hon. Gentleman to say what he did.

The hon. Gentleman questioned the form that the regulations take. The regulations are more detailed than the Act. They contain a list of the pesticides that will be covered by the regulations. They also deal with the treatment of anti-fouling paints and aerial spraying and control over the sale, supply, storage, advertising and use of pesticides.

The hon. Gentleman must accept that in principle Ministers should be able to add other controls as circumstances change. In law, those changes must follow the intentions of the enabling legislation. He does not have to wait for the consents to see what they contain. The schedules contain all the conditions that will be included in the consents, apart from the one exception to which I referred. I say again that we intend to take powers under section 28 to ensure that it applies to all sites of special scientific interest. That is in addition to the consent. I have already fully explained what will be added. All the conditions that are contained in the schedules will be included in the consents.

A number of hon. Members have referred to enforcement. Apart from the agricultural inspectorate, trading standards officers will look after the sale of pesticides, environmental health officers will enforce conditions relating to use on premises not visited by the Health and Safety Executive, the agricultural departments will investigate wildlife incidents and crop damage, and the railways inspectorate, among others, will also be involved. Enforcement will be shared between them.

Recruitment to the agricultural inspectorate is in progress. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has been unable to divert the envisaged additional resources, because of other demands. However, the Health and Safety Commission has assured the Government that the inspectorate will be able to meet its responsibilities.

Mr. John: The hon. Lady must have had the same pap served up to her as a brief when she gave her promise on Report. Why did she promise to recruit 12 additional inspectors to carry out a wide range of extra duties if she had no intention of fulfilling that promise?

Mrs. Fenner: Again that is a travesty. That was the number of additional inspectors that the inspectorate assured us would be necessary. Recruitment for that number will continue, but the Health and Safety Executive has assured us that it has sufficient inspectors with which to enforce its responsibilities.

A number of hon. Members referred in particular to adjuvants. I take seriously the charge that the Government have been slipshod over their treatment of adjuvants. They are not pesticides. Therefore, they do not feature in the regulations. I accept the point that was made about the wording. There will be a reference to a list. I have explained that we have been testing adjuvants as though they were pesticides. We will continue to test them and produce a list of acceptable adjuvants, but I cannot give the exact wording that will be involved. However, we will state that a particular pesticide may be used with adjuvant from the list.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) questioned the stability of formulation. I can assure him that that will be one of the properties evaluated before a product is approved. We would not approve a product which deteriorated too rapidly. We also require labels to contain guidance on the storage conditions appropriate to maintain the qualities of a pesticide. The code of practice for distributors and users will contain guidance on stock controls.

I was sorry that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) needed to comment on the temporary absence from the Chamber of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment. He will see that she has returned. It was especially ungracious of the hon. Member to comment in that way as we all know that hon. Members move in and out of the Chamber during debates. My hon. Friend listened with great care to the opening speeches.

I can tell the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey that the regulations cover the sale, supply, storage, use and advertisements of all pesticides even when used for non-agricultural purposes. He made a general point that he believed that consultations were inadequate. The document was issued in November and we issued almost 1,500 copies of the consultation document. We received about 125 written submissions and we held 25 detailed discussions with representative organisations. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can assert that that constitutes inadequate consultation. We have not had responses to that effect.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) made several points. Reference to the safe, efficient and humane control of pests is not contained in the regulations because that is already written into the enabling Act. Hon. Members have mentioned many of the points covered in the consultative document which do not appear in the regulations. The reason is that the consultative document described the legislative and administrative arrangements which will operate.

The hon. Member for Brightside referred to the five-year reviews detailed in the consultative document. However, it is not appropriate to review every five years, because during that time many pesticides are still in active development and therefore constantly being re-evaluated. One of the important reasons for farmers to keep records is that they might show that there needed to be an additional review. The review system is set up to review every pesticide every 10 years and it can take ad hoc decisions to review pesticides for a specific reason. I hope that the hon. Member for Brightside will be reassured.

Resolved,

That the draft Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986, which were laid before this House on 3rd July, be approved.

Members' Office, Secretarial and Research Allowance

12.12 am

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I beg to move,

That, in the opinion of this House, the first Resolution of 20th July 1984 (limit on office, secretarial and research allowance) should have effect as if—

(a) the limit for the year ending with 31st March 1986 had remained at £13,211, and

(b) the relevant percentage for the year ending with 31st March 1987 were 6 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected both the amendments on the Order Paper: that in the name of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) — in paragraph (a), to leave out "remained at £13,211" and insert "been £19,000.". — and that in the name of the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) — in paragraph (b), leave out "6" and insert "18".

It may be for the convenience of the House if the amendments are debated with the motion, and I ask the respective hon. Members to move them formally at the end of the debate. Is that for the convenience of the House?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Biffen: The House will have seen the answer which I gave last Thursday to a question from my hon. Friend, the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle) about the secretarial, office and research allowance, which, for convenience, I shall now refer to as the secretarial allowance.

The answer had two elements to it. The first, and wider, element was the announcement that I had written to the chairman of the Top Salaries Review Body, inviting it to carry out the four-yearly review of the level and structure of the secretarial allowance as I had previously undertaken to do.

The second, and narrower, point dealt with the uprating of the allowance for this year. That is the point which concerns us tonight. It is the reason why that I have put this motion before the House. I intend, therefore, to confine my remarks to the annual uprating, although I will of course ensure that our proceedings tonight are also referred to the TSRB for consideration.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Will my right hon. Friend say why he writes to the Top Salaries Review Body when, whenever it reports, the Government consistently ignore its recommendations?

Mr. Biffen: I have communicated with the TSRB because I was asked to do so by many right hon. and hon. Members.

I should say a few words about the two amendments, both of which have been selected. The amendment in the names of the hon. Members for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) and for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) accepts the proposed percentage increase in the current year of 6 per cent., but they would set aside the size of the allowance determined by the arrangements which the House confirmed in 1984, and replace it with a substantially higher figure.

This deals with an issue which I know is of concern, and legitimately so, to a number of Members. However, it invites debate not about the interim uprating figure but about the size of the allowance itself. I feel that this should really be a matter for the Top Salaries Review Body, and I very much hope that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury will submit to it the evidence which he believes sustains such a figure. I do not feel that this should be part of this evening's decision.

The amendment in the names of the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and the hon. Member for Battersea deals more directly with the interim uprating before us today. It would provide for an increase of 18 per cent. in the allowance for the current year. In the course of my remarks on the resolution, I shall indicate why I believe that a 6 per cent. increase is preferable to the larger increase proposed in this amendment.

I turn now to the resolution itself. At present, the arrangements for the secretarial allowance are as agreed by the House on 20 July 1984. That resolution followed the TSRB recommendation that the annual percentage increase in the secretarial allowance should be the same percentage increase as for the salary plus inner London weighting for a civil servant at the maximum point of the senior personal secretary scale. The advantages of automatic uprating are manifest. It enables the House to devise a formula by which the level of the allowance should be determined, and then allows that to be put into practice without the need for a further debate each year. There has been general support for that view.

However, the most careful linkage plans are nonetheless capable of producing unintended perversities. The House has to react in a spirit of equity and common sense. Members will recall, indeed, that this occurred relatively recently in relation to the motor mileage allowance, which was also set by a mechanism of linkage.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): As the Leader of the House is no doubt aware, press reports have suggested that the secretarial research allowance could form part of a Member's salary. In his reply, will he say that it does not form part of our salary and that it is administered in such a way by the Fees Office that that is, in fact, impossible?

Mr. Biffen: It is absolutely clear that the secretarial allowance does not form part of a Member's salary and any press comment suggesting that it does was misconceived. The rates payable to Members in respect of the motor mileage allowance were tied to those applicable in the Civil Service. Then, in July 1983, considerable disquiet was expressed by Members about the changes implicit in continuing that link, because of the way in which the Civil Service rates had been restructured. It was felt this inflicted an unintended disadvantage upon Members. As a consequence——

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Is not the debate about the secretarial allowance and not Members' car allowances, which is irrelevant?

Mr. Biffen: I can understand that my hon. Friend may not appreciate the line of argument, which is that linkage is very valuable. If linkage produces perverse consequences which have been detrimental to Members, there has been no shortage of voices saying that the linkage should be set aside. As I was saying, as a consequence the linkage formula was set aside and eventually the House confirmed an alternative system mainly based upon the recommendations of Lord Peyton and his aides.

In the case of the secretarial allowance, again it is the restructuring within the Civil Service which would produce a distortion of the intended arrangements.

Mr. Jack Straw (Birkenhead): Will the Leader of the House accept that the perversity arises from the Government's proposal and not from the system? When Lord Plowden wrote to the right hon. Gentleman on 16 May 1984, he said that the allowance should be linked to the salaries of senior personal secretaries

"whose work we consider to be broadly analogous in terms of quality to the type of secretarial support generally required by MPs."

The restructuring to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred has been required as a result of negotiations because it has been accepted that those secretaries need a significant increase in their salaries. If they need a significant increase in their salaries, why do our secretaries not?

Mr. Biffen: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I shall cover that point, A rise is not going to Civil Service grades in actual pay as would be suggested merely by the alteration in scale.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): There is a linkage to senior personal secretaries, and they have not been regarded in their structure. Their proficiency has been included in their grading as a recognition of work change as a result of word processors and other technology. There has been no restructuring of the grade, and there is a clear understanding of that within the Civil Service.

Mr. Biffen: I take that point.

Early this year, there was a restructuring of the pay of secretarial grades within the Civil Service. Part of this restructuring involved the withdrawal of proficiency allowances and their consolidation into pay scales for senior personal secretaries. It had the effect of increasing the maximum point of the senior personal secretary scale by about 12 per cent., including inner London weighting. In fact, however, scarcely any senior personal secretaries gained an increase of this size as most of them had been receiving proficiency allowances. Many received no increase.

The difficulty with the secretarial allowance link arises from the terms of the 1984 resolution. This based the uprating solely on the increase in the salary scale as such, and took no account of allowances. Indeed, allowances and overtime were excluded from the calculation as they tend to vary between individuals and years, and complicated what was intended to be a relatively simple pay link. Thus we have the perversity that the increase in the relevant Civil Service pay scale affects the proposed percentage increase in the secretarial allowance whereas the offsetting impact of consolidating certain Civil Service allowances on net pay is disregarded.

Taking into account the 6 per cent. increase in salary scales provided for in this year's Civil Service pay award and whatever adjustment is agreed in respect of London weighting, the automatic uprating would produce an increase of about 18 per cent. in the secretarial allowance in the year beginning of 1 April 1986 compared with the previous year.

Nor would the effects of proceeding——

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): May I ask my right hon. Friend a somewhat academic and vulgar question, the answer to which might be of interest to some hon. Members? The Government feel that it is now appropriate to break the linkage with regard to secretarial allowances, and a certain linkage has been agreed with regard to Members' allowances and pay. What will be the Government's view on that linkage?

Mr. Biffen: The reconsideration of linkage goes no further than the secretarial allowance, and in respect of this year only. Any attempt to suggest or imply that it goes wider than that is mistaken.

Nor would the effects of proceeding with this disproportionate increase be confined to the secretarial allowance for this financial year. Because the increase in the main pay scale for senior personal secretaries took effect from 1 March 1986, there would be an increase in the allowance of £139 for the last financial year.

The resolution therefore seeks to make provision on both these points. First, it would set aside the unanticipated increase in the allowance of £139 for the year ending on 31 March 1986. The secretarial allowance would thus remain at £13,211 for that year, as we expected it to do. Secondly, it suspends the operation of the automatic uprating formula provided in the original resolution for the current financial year. Instead it provides for the secretarial allowance to be increased by 6 per cent. in this year. The allowance would thus rise to just over £14,000 in this year.

The passage of this resolution would in no way prevent the interim uprating from reverting to the formula arrangements provided for in the 1984 resolution in future. Indeed, that is the intention, pending a decision by the House about what the TSRB recommends.

I accept at once that departing from the formula this year involves nominating a percentage increase which must, to some extent, be arbitrary. But the figure of 6 per cent. represents the general pay increase in the Civil Service, and, I believe, is valid on that basis. As I have already said, I will, however, draw the specific attention of the TSRB to the arrangements we have made this year, so that it can be considered as one of its immediate priorities and it can report accordingly.

I have brought forward this motion in a spirit of equity and realism. [Laughter.] It is a view in which I am reinforced, knowing how the House reacted when the motor mileage allowance moved adversely.

Perversities in a linkage formula should not provide substantial hardship or windfall benefit. The operation of the link must be tempered by common sense. I have, also, felt it right that the matter should be settled before we rise for the summer recess. I believe the House would wish for an equitable increase in the secretarial allowance to be made available and capable of being backdated before the House rises. The resolution in my name would allow an increase in the secretarial allowance for this year of 6 per cent.—broadly in line with the overall increase in pay awarded to the grade with which the link was made in 1984. It is a reasonable response to an irksome problem. I commend the resolution to the House.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): This is not the finest hour of the Leader of the House and nor could it be when, stripped of all the verbage, he is inviting the House, not to increase the secretarial allowance by 18 per cent. which would be the automatic consequence of his not introducing the order, but to reduce any increase to 6 per cent. That is the essence of the debate.

Nevertheless, this is a welcome opportunity for the House not only to debate its grossly inadequate secretarial allowance, but to do something in the Lobbies tonight to achieve a long overdue, though modest, increase. The opportunity is all the more welcome because for the first time we are dealing with the issue separately and it is in no way related to the inherently embarrassing question of hon. Members' pay or travel allowance. Whichever way the vote goes tonight—I pick up the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) and Conservative Members—Members of Parliament will not receive a penny more in their hands.

We are debating the level of increase in the so-called secretarial allowance which covers, not only the pay of hon. Members' secretaries, but their office expenses and research assistants. The proper start of the debate is the report of the Top Salaries Review Body under the chairmanship of Lord Plowden which reported in May 1983. He went to some pains to assess what he thought was the proper level of support for Members of Parliament, helped in their task by professional consultants. In his conclusion, Lord Plowden recommended that at June 1983 the appropriate maximum for the allowance available to Members of Parliament for secretarial and research assistance was £13,000 a year. Additionally, the report recommended the introduction of an allowance to meet general office expenses, including necessary capital expenditure on equipment, and that the appropriate maximum for the allowance at June 1983 was £1,000 a year. In total, therefore, the TSRB recommended a £14,000 per annum secretarial allowance for Members of Parliament covering secretarial, research and office expenses from June 1983.

Subsequently, the Lord Privy Seal invited the TSRB to consider how parliamentary allowances might be uprated automatically from year to year to avoid the need for annual parliamentary resolutions. In response, on 16 May 1984, Lord Plowden wrote:

> "Although this allowance is of a composite nature, we think it reasonable to assume that the major part of it will normally be devoted to meeting secretarial costs and so provide for its uprating on this basis. In making our recommendations on the appropriate levels of secretarial support for last year, we took particular account of the salaries of senior personal secretaries in the Civil Service whose work we consider to be broadly analogous in terms of quality to the type of secretarial support generally required by MPs."

The Plowden committee recommended, therefore, that the composite secretarial allowance be linked with the percentage increase in salary, plus London weighting, of the named Civil Service secretarial scale, and that automatic increase occurred during the past two years.

The reason why we have this debate tonight and why the increase proposed is not to be automatic, as the House had previously decided, is that, following the abolition of proficiency payments, the pay of the relevant Civil Service secretarial grade to which the secretarial allowance is linked is this year to rise by 18 per cent. What the Government cannot bear is the prospect that the secretarial allowance of Members of Parliament, covering as it does secretarial, research and office expenses, should rise by that amount. They want to renege on the automatic uprating commitment into which they entered in July 1984. That is why they want to reduce the 18 per cent. to 6 per cent.

The House might have some sympathy with the Government if they had carried out the TSRB report in other respects, but they have not and they did not. As Members of Parliament know very well, having received the TSRB recommendations for a total allowance of £14,000 per annum in 1983, and having received a recommendation for a £19,000 per annum parliamentary salary at the same time, the Government rejected the latter part of the report and thus threw the whole TSRB settlement into the melting pot.

There emerged from that, after much effort by the right hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. du Cann), the then chairman of the 1922 Committee, a compromise which fell substantially short of the TSRB's 1983 recommendation. As a result, the total secretarial allowance was reduced from the £14,000 that was recommended to £12,000 per annum. All the annual upratings of that allowance have proceeded from a base not of £14,000, but of £12,000.

If the Lord Privy Seal's order is carried tonight, the total secretarial and research allowance will reach £14,004 per annum—£4 more than the TSRB thought it right to be paid in June 1983, three years ago. The salary of a senior personal secretary in the Civil Service is now £10,870 per annum. That would leave of the parliamentary allowance a mere £3,134, out of which hon. Members are expected to pay for research assistants and office expenses. It is a ridiculously inadequate sum, and I intend to show why.

It can well be argued that the main component—the pay of secretaries—is itself inadequate, especially when we take into account the inevitably long and capricious hours that Members, by the nature of their work, are obliged to undertake. As for the conditions in which many secretaries have to work, they can be described only as disgraceful. The £3,134 difference between the full parliamentary allowance and the Civil Service secretarial grade becomes a negative figure when we analyse the cost components of Members' other expenses.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the top rate paid to secretaries in Whitehall is £10,230? Whitehall finds it extremely difficult to recruit suitably qualified candidates. What does that say about what we pay our secretaries?

Mr. Shore: The hon. Gentleman makes a most powerful and telling point.

I want to show why we have a negative figure for the residual part of the parliamentary allowance once the secretarial salary has been taken care of. First—I pick up the point made by the hon. Gentleman—Members must find their own contributions, as employers, towards their secretaries' national insurance. On a salary of £10,870 per annum, that would amount to £1,136 in employer's national insurance payments. That reduces the £3,134 allowance difference to £1,998.

Secondly, there are the inevitable office expenses. They were calculated by the TSRB at £1,000 in June 1983. If we applied the retail price index, that would amount to £1,150 today. That reduces the remaining £1,998 to £848. Thirdly, if Members paid their secretaries at the Civil Service comparable level, and financed their office expenses at the Plowden report level, they would have the princely sum of £848 left over to purchase research assistance. That is the main reason why my hon. Friends the Members for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) and for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) tabled their amendment. I shall support them, just as I supported the similar amendments that they moved two years ago.

The TSRB, in its report, never understood the importance of research assistants. As long ago as February 1980, in its 13th report, the TSRB recommended a payment of £1,250 per annum. That meagre sum, updated over the past six years, would now be £2,190, leaving Members with a minus secretarial allowance of about £1,350 per annum. It is against that background that the automatic 18 per cent. increase that the Government seek to reduce should be judged. An 18 per cent. increase would mean a parliamentary allowance of £15,670. If the TSBR's 1983 report had been adopted, and increases in line with the RPI had been approved, that sum would be £16,140. Therefore, the proposed £15,670 can hardly be thought to be excessive. The Government are not in a position to quibble, for they tabled amendments to accept that part of the TSRB report dealing with secretarial allowance for the debate on 19 July 1983.

We are debating a small and inadequate real increase in the secretarial allowance, but it would allow some minor improvements in what Members are able to pay for secretarial services research and office equipment. I have no inhibition in recommending that we do so. There is no proposal for improving our own rewards, our own standard of living. What is before us is small improvement in the resources we need to do our job more effectively.

We are the most ill-equipped and under-supported democracy in the Western world. The needs of our constituents continue to grow, and the problems of our nation constantly increase. The need for better information to improve Members' vigilance over Government actions and policies is obvious, all the more so when we recall the immense back-up of professional bureaucratic and other expertise that is available to Ministers.

Despite chronic understaffing, our Parliament works effectively and Members of Parliament provide a valuable service to their constituents. but the needs are growing and there is no doubt that we could improve all our activities if we had available to us more adequate secretarial, research and office services. The 18 per cent. is only a pointer in the right direction. Nevertheless, I very much hope that the House will defeat the Government's proposal for a 6 per cent. increase and that it will take the bolder step of supporting the amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): I intervene briefly because, since the last war, I have been concerned in one way or another with salaries and salary administration. I should like to consider the history of this matter.

The need for Members of Parliament to have secretaries is due to the vast increase in correspondence over the past 25 years. There has been also a sharp increase in lobbying by sending hon. Members circulars on all kinds of topics. Many of these letters are typewritten, as are Members' replies. I often think that the typewriter is a curse, as is television. In the days when all communications were written by hand and had to be copied by hand, as in the time of Lord Palmerston and after, people were careful in writing only what was strictly necessary and avoiding the ceaseless verbiage from which we all suffer. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] This applies to the Civil Service as well. Members of Parliament are subjected also to all kinds of questions about welfare problems which add greatly to correspondence and which are more properly the concern of local councillors.

Nevertheless, a mass of correspondence must be dealt with, and a competent secretary is a necessity for hon. Members. The allowance is designed to cover the cost of a research assistant and office expenses. But, on this matter, I shall displease some hon. Members. I wonder whether all these assistants are strictly necessary. They have led to an absurd increase in the number of written questions, which cost the taxpayer a lot of money and which are seldom read in Hansard or elsewhere.

Of course, we Members of Parliament must scrutinise the actions of the Executive, but we have, after all, an excellent Library in the House of Commons to help us with many of our inquiries. The main job of a Member of Parliament is not constantly to grub about in detail but to make a broad judgment of the facts.

I do not believe that, if all research assistants were to be done away with, the work of the House as a whole would suffer. Some of our most brilliant luminaries—some of whom are not here tonight—have no research assistants and write most of their correspondence in longhand, as I do.

I come to the precise point of the debate. In the past, I have frequently criticised Governments of both parties for their dealings in these matters. Of course, I realise that the job of a secretary here is not the glamorous one that the public think. Secretaries work for long hours, doing hard work and often working for very dull chaps; so it is not quite the exciting job that some people think.

I realise also that the salaries paid here are not as high as those paid in the City and in some parts of industry. Nevertheless, people wish to work here as secretaries. If we omitted from our calculations the cost of those research assistants, the new money proposed of roughly £14,000 a year would cover the cost of a competent secretary, plus the cost of office expenses. Therefore, I believe that, on the whole, the Government deserve our support today.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I shall not be long. I have never spoken in one of these debates before. Amused as we may well have been by the Victorian comedy turn that we have just heard, the fact is that this is a disgraceful motion which has been put before us by the Leader of the House.

I have always been told that this is a matter for the House, not a matter for the Government. I have always favoured — many other hon. Members on both sides have—some external judgment, if possible an objective judgment, of those matters, so that they could be implemented and operated automatically. The Top Salaries Review Body pay review, which the Leader of the House invites us to bring into operation yet again, produced exactly that two years ago and was summarily dismissed by the same person. I remember that night well. It is also pretty disgraceful that those matters, which are important, are discussed so late with so little opportunity for hon. Members to take part. I know that I am privileged, in a sense, in having the chance to take part in the debate tonight. Many other hon. Members never will. That is wrong.

On that night two years ago, I remember that the payroll vote and the well-off vote voted down the less well-off vote. Those who could afford research assistants and secretarial support from private funds voted to deny finance from public funds to those who could not afford it. That is what happened. It had nothing to do with the House. It had nothing to do with any assessment of the needs of hon. Members. It had nothing to do with any constitutional concept — the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) talked about the need for a proper check on the Executive. It had nothing to do with proper salaries.

The House should not accept that approach. The House should reject that approach. I call upon hon. Members to do so.

12.47 am

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): I noticed that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House referred in his closing remarks to a spirit of realism. I have rarely heard from the Front Bench words that were so unrealistic as those he used tonight. For example, I refer to a place where he may seek a secretary for the future—The Times. I refer him to "La Crème de la Crème", on page 29 of Wednesday's edition. There he will see that secretaries are being offered £15,000 plus. That is the world of realism, not the unrealistic world that he put before us.

If we look, furthermore, at the international comparisons, which have not been alluded to by my right hon. Friend, we see that when the allowance was £8,752 in October 1982, the Canadian House of Commons was allowing over £41,000, the Federal German Republic over £15,000, the French National Assembly over £14,000 and the European Assembly over £16,000. I could go on. The United States Senate was allowing £365,000. If we are to refer to both a secretarial allowance and an office allowance in terms of depreciation of typewriters, national insurance, the 10 per cent. extra for the pension——

Mr. Richard Holt (Littleborough and Saddleworth): We are talking not only about the salaries that are paid to these good secretaries, but about their physical working conditions. Those in our Parliament must be compared with those in other Parliaments.

Mr. Gregory: That is a relevant point, and I hope that we shall have an opportunity to debate it soon after the recess.

I conclude by urging my right hon. Friend to withdraw the resolution, or at least to abstain on it. It will be in the best interests of the House if he does so.

12.49 am

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I shall speak briefly because I do not wish to detain the House while more of the payroll vote is summoned in. I commend my amendment. It will enable us to pay decent wages and employ two workers, rather than one, or one and a bit if we can scrape the money together, and it will enable us to provide a decent service to our constituents.

Mr. Tony Banks rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put, but MR. SPEAKER withheld his assent and declined then to put that Question.

12.50 am

Mr. Biffen: The debate would not be entirely traditional unless the Leader of the House had had a chance to say a few last words. The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said that he did not think that this was my finest hour. I do not believe that any Leader of the House inviting the House to consider such matters is ever likely to find the House in the most calm, detatched and charitable of moods.

Many more weighty decisions will be taken by the House during this and the next week, but the public, reasonably, will be monitoring what we do now. The debate, and our decision on the motion, are about the techniques of interim uprating of the secretarial allowance between the four-yearly reviews. This is a difficult occasion. I believe in what I have argued, that this is not the occasion to try to rewrite the scale of the secretarial allowance. That is why we are having an inquiry, and those who are seeking to rewrite the scale of the allowance are perverting the intentions of the debate. Ultimately, they will be judged by how they handle public spending, which is how they will be judged in this instance.

Amendment proposed to the Question, in paragraph (a), leave out 'remained at £13,211' and insert 'been £19,000.' —[Mr. Chris Smith.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

PETITION

Irina Ratushinskaya

1.21 am

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): I beg to ask leave to present two petitions, the first signed by 56 petitioners from the members of St. Michael's church of the parish of Tingwynlais in my constituency, and the second, signed by 85 petitioners, from the Zion Methodist church, Tonypandy.

The two petitions are almost identically worded and refer to Irina Ratushinskaya, who is the subject of two early-day motions—No. 420, in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and No. 611 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley).

The poetess is confined in a Soviet labour camp for writing poetry. She is in poor health and, in the view of her husband and fellow prisoners, her life is in danger. The petition concludes:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House will encourage the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues in their representations to the Soviet Government for the purpose of obtaining both the release of Mrs. Ratushinskaya from the labour camp and her urgently needed medical assessment and treatment.

I am sure that the petitions have the support of many right hon. and hon. Members. I add my full support to them.

Mentally Handicapped and Mentally Ill Prisoners

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

1.22 am

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I wish to raise a matter which I think is of considerable importance and which, as far as I know, has not been debated for some time. It might be of special interest this week as I understand that tomorrow an important Committee report on these matters is to be published. I therefore look forward to the Minister's response.

I recently visited Barlinnie prison in Glasgow. I know that some of the circumstances of the prison, if not of the visit, are known to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Brown), who I am delighted to see in his place. While I was there, I met and spoke to mentally handicapped and mentally ill persons who had been sent to that prison.

I should like to make it clear that the governor, Mr. Gallagher, the medical staff and all of the personnel at the prison seemed to be doing their utmost to help the persons concerned and I would not wish to reflect on their dedication. I have not recently met anyone, whether the families of the persons concerned or those responsible for running prisons and those who have a general interest in these matters, who takes the view that that sort of person should be in Her Majesty's prisons.

Society punishes law breakers, but we ought not to punish sick people; we ought to try to heal them. I know that the House will note the concern of such organisations as the National Prisoners' movement, PROP, the Prison Officers Association and the Scottish Prison Officers Association. I was interested to read in The Scotsman this morning the words of Mr. John Renton, the spokesman for the Scottish Prison Officers Association, who said that Scotland's prisons are not geared up to treating disturbed or mentally handicapped prisoners, although they do their best with the resources available. He continued:

"Prisons do what they can to provide treatment, but they don't have the medical and nursing staff geared to the problem."

I most certainly agree with that. This problem has United Kingdom implications and its dimensions go well beyond Scotland. It is not a new problem. Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons has raised these matters on many occasions.

The report of 1984 said:

"In previous reports we have expressed our concern about the detention of mentally disordered offenders in prison, when what they need is treatment in an appropriate psychiatric institution. Prison medical officers have frequently told us that managing mentally ill offenders was the hardest part of their duties. Many governors expressed similar views. There may be room for argument over the number of those offenders who could be better cared for in a mental hospital, but there can be no doubt that many are inappropriately confined to prison."

One of the difficulties we have in trying to establish the extent of the problems is to find out precisely how many people who are mentally handicapped or mentally ill are spending their time in prison. I do not necessarily criticise the present Government on this point, but I do believe that Governments should be much more forthcoming than they are in trying to make assessments and endeavouring to provide information to the House and the country as to how many people are in prisons when they are mentally handicapped or mentally ill and manifestly should be elsewhere in their own interest and in the interest of society.

I have seen great variations in the estimates. On 25 October 1985 the New Statesman suggested that about 23,000 of the prison population had some kind of mental problem. It said that from 14 per cent. to 45 per cent. of the prison population are said to be in those categories.

I was astonished to discover that the Scottish Home and Health Department says that no statistics of any sort on mentally handicapped or mentally ill prisoners are collected in Scotland. I hope that in due course that can be put right. In this respect, I welcome the presence of the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay).

The BBC, in its "Newsnight" programme — I congratulate it most warmly—on 7 July presented what I thought was an excellent analysis of some of the problems in this area. The programme dealt mainly with the tragic case, which is probably well known to the Minister, of Russell Ramsdon who, before the completion of the video which was trying to cover and assess his problems, unfortunately committed suicide. Clearly, Russell Ramsdon should not have found himself in prison. I agree entirely with the BBC in its assertion.

In drawing the Minister's attention to the programme — I thank the BBC for giving me the transcript — I would like to say that there are at least three points about which I think the Minister may be interested in what "Newsnight" had to say, if only because it is relevant to the wider problems which I invite the House to consider. Incidentally, I had asked for an Adjournment debate for many weeks before the programme took place.

The "Newsnight" programme was introduced by Donald MacCormack, who said:

"This autumn an emergency working party, set up by the Home Office, will report on a mounting crisis in Britain's jails, where now more than fifteen hundred mentally ill offenders are serving sentences, some psychiatrists put this figure as high as fifteen thousand, a third of Britain's prison population. Twelve years ago the Butler Committee recommended that two thousand places in special hospitals called Regional Secure Units should be provided for these offenders, but today there are barely more than four hundred of them."

Elsewhere in the programme there were comments which I think are worthy of the Minister's attention. Mr. Julian O'Halloran said:

"Since the 1950s the number of beds has halved in psychiatric hospitals, because of a policy of getting patients to live back in the community. But where have these mentally ill people really gone?

"Over the same period, the prison population has been rising remorselessly, it's now about double what it was thirty years ago. And suspicious doctors have noted an almost exact correlation between the two figures."

Immediately that was said, Dr. Malcolm Weller said:

"It's almost a one to one relationship, that is for every patient who is discharged from hospital, there is a corresponding increase in the prison population."

During the programme my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) — I think that the House recognises the excellent work which he has done in these matters—made an intervention which I consider to be worthy of repetition. He said:

"Successive governments have given something like £80 million to the 14 Regional Health Authorities, tied specifically to the provision of units providing services for mentally disabled patients. Today, over 12 years later, we have got 10 units with less than 400 beds, another two units to come into being in the next two years and a further two Regional Health Authorities, both of whom, Oxford and the South West Thames Regional Health Authority, have received millions of pounds of public money to provide the facility for some of the most disadvantaged, vulnerable and deprived of our fellow citizens, and neither of them have actually got a single brick built or established to build those units."

It seems clear that somewhere along the way we are failing in the objectives that I think the House would want to set in seeking a solution to these problems.

When there was a debate in another place on these matters it was established clearly that there are departmental grey areas. I ask the Minister to address himself to these matters and to tell the House — if not tonight, I hope that he will do so in the not-too-distant future—the number of offenders that come within these categories and how many are occupying places in prison.

The Butler report on abnormal offenders recommended as far back as 1975 that 2,000 places should be made available at appropriate and special institutions in the regional secure units. All the evidence suggests — this was said recently in another place — that we have no more than 120 places along those lines. If that figure is not accurate, I am sure that the Minister will bring the House up to date. We are nowhere near the objective set by the Butler report in its recommendations.

I pay tribute to organisations such as MIND which have done so much work on these issues. In my opinion, MIND gave excellent evidence to the committee which considered these matters and which is, I understand, to report tomorrow. MIND takes the view—it is one that I share — that it would be a mistake not to grasp the nettle of integrating the prison medical service with the NHS in a meaningful manner. We are a long way from achieving any effective co-ordination of that sort. Without that, or something like it, nothing will really change for the mentally ill who are in prison.

Like MIND, I favour all attempts to divert mentally ill offenders from prison, but I cannot see that anything short of additional resources for the NHS to provide secure places and a new power for the courts to direct regional health authorities to provide treatment for mentally ill offenders will achieve the objective.

There is a need to review the law on mentally ill offenders. In the meantime, I ask the Minister what the Government are doing to try to cope with the problems and to anticipate additional problems which the prison authorities might have to face. There is a clear need within the prison service for more psychiatric facilities. Clearly, attitudes must also change dramatically before we can talk of ourselves as being a caring society in respect of the mentally disadvantaged. Not much has been achieved since the Butler report and even the May report when a chief inspector takes the view, as one did recently, that many mentally ill offenders are at present inappropriately confined to prison, when the director of the prison medical services has expressed his strong concern about these problems, and when the director general of the prison service describes overcrowding in prisons as an affront to any civilised society.

Obviously, prison is depressing enough for any person. To suffer mental illness is also a dreadful experience. But to ask people to endure both prison and mental illness or handicap is something which all hon. Members would deplore.

I invite the Minister to address himself to those problems and to give the House some assurance about resources and new progressive thinking, and, in particular, to tell us what the Government have in mind for providing the regional secure units which society feels is long overdue if we are to deal with those problems compassionately, reasonably, and urgently.

1.35 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) for raising this issue. He has demonstrated through his private Member's Bill, which has now received the Royal Assent and become an Act, a deep regard for the rights and circumstances of disabled people, including those who may be mentally ill or mentally handicapped. His was a carefully prepared and considered speech and I wish to respond to it as thoroughly and helpfully as I can. I hope that the information that I have prepared will meet some of the points he raised. I assure him that I shall go through the debate later and if there are matters which I do not have a chance to deal with tonight, I shall write to him. I have also had the opportunity of talking to my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay), who came to listen to the hon. Gentleman's speech, and he will write to the hon. Gentleman about the purely Scottish points, on which I am not competent to offer him advice.

Inevitably, serious issues arise when one considers whether mentally disordered people should under any circumstances be within the prison system. Even if it is accepted that they should, there will always be anxiety about the type of provision made for them. The hon. Gentleman made all those points in his speech.

We must start from the basic fact that some people who are mentally disordered commit criminal offences, and if they are brought to court, it is a matter for the court to weigh the relevant points at issue. That may include the protection of the public and the state of mind of the offender. The court must judge the most appropriate disposal. The courts will have cognisance of the provisions of the Mental Health Act 1983, which consolidated the law relating to mentally disordered people and made some significant changes.

There are two main issues. The first is the extent to which the operation of the Mental Health Act enables mentally disordered offenders to be directed away from prison. The second is whether mentally disordered people who are in prison, most of whom are not detainable under the Mental Health Act and cannot therefore be transferred to hospital solely on account of their mental state, receive adequate medical attention and support through the prison regime. Let me set out the Department's policies on these issues.

First, it is our policy to transfer out of prison into hospital as many mentally disordered offenders as possible who are detainable under the Mental Health Act 1983, while monitoring the extent to which various sections of the Act may be regarded as effective. Secondly, it is our policy to maintain a close liaison with the DHSS, the special hospitals and the psychiatric services, regarding the provision of sufficient hospital places. Thirdly, it is our policy to provide an appropriate regime for mentally disordered people who have to stay in the prison system.

It might be helpful to the House if I pointed to the most relevant parts of the Mental Health Act 1983. A substantial element in the prison population comprises defendants, both convicted and unconvicted, who are remanded in custody, often for medical reports. Many of those are mentally disordered. The best hope of making a significant impact on their number is by means of the alternative of remand to hospital under sections 35 and 36 of the Mental Health Act, which were innovations and were brought into force on 1 October 1984. Those sections give courts the power to remand to hospital for a report on the prisoner's mental condition or for treatment. Their use is governed by the requirement that the court should first have medical reports and the offer of a bed from a suitable hospital.

Section 47 of the Mental Health Act empowers the Home Secretary to transfer from prison to hospital any sentenced prisoner who is so mentally disordered that he could be compulsorily detained in a mental hospital if he were in the community. Such transfer can be made only when a hospital bed is available for the prisoner that offers an adequate degree of security and treatment appropriate to his medical condition. Prison sentences for offenders who are mentally disordered at the time of their appearance in court can be avoided altogether if the court so decides, and the offender can be made the subject of a hospital order under section 37 of the Act, provided that the court is satisfied on the evidence of two doctors that the offender is suffering from mental disorder of a nature or degree that makes it appropriate for him to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment—that is to say, he would be detainable, even if not an offender, in order to be transferred.

Mr. Tom Clarke: The Minister may intend to deal with this point later, but is he aware that often the courts simply do not know where to send an offender because there is not adequate accommodation or facilities that they believe to be in the best interests of the offender? Have not views along those lines been expressed to the Minister?

Mr. Mellor: Yes, and we have been pressing hard and providing resources to ensure that every area has a regional secure unit to relieve the burden. There was some delay earlier in providing those, which was the subject of representations by the Home Secretary. We hope that the framework has now been established so that courts can be properly advised by those who are there to help them make these difficult decisions and to ensure that facilities are available. We can never wholly guarantee that courts will have the facilities that they want; from time to time cases arise that show that courts do not feel that they have those facilities. However, with the network of regional secure units coming into place provision is certainly better than it was, although it falls short of what anyone would consider ideal. I think that that is the hon. Gentleman's point.

Under section 41 of the Act, a Crown court may also make a restriction order, if it considers it necessary for the protection of the public from serious harm. Again, such an order can be made only if a suitable hospital bed is available.

Every effort is made to ensure that any prisoner who is detainably mentally disordered is transferred to hospital for psychiatric treatment, in accordance with the policy of reducing the prison population by the removal of certain categories of offender who ought not to be in prison. In accordance with that policy, the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to hear that the number of prisoners transferred to hospital has been rising rapidly and the success rate in dealing with recommendations for such transfers is high. On 31 March 1986, the number of sentenced prisoners who were considered to be mentally disordered within the terms of the Mental Health Act 1983 stood at 124, the same as at March 1985. That was 23 higher than at September 1985, but significantly lower than the 347 of June 1979.

Before I refer to existing facilities within the prison system, I should like to make two points which, while I am sure the hon. Gentleman is aware of them, might be overlooked by others. The first is that the prison system is not an island, a kind of self-sufficient microcosm of the general community. There is a substantial degree of functional integration with the NHS and prison medical officers making ready use of NHS facilities, including the advice available from consultant psychiatrists.

Secondly, with a very few exceptional cases, for those people who commit criminal offences and get sent to prison, the system is most accurately seen in context as an interlude—albeit that for some this may be measurable in years—between their more substantive periods in the community. We are therefore debating the care and management of mentally disordered people who, because of the offences they have committed, are in prison transit. There is an important corollary to that view, which I shall touch on in a moment.

What of existing facilities within the prison system? They are highlighted by the regime at Grendon prison. There are also facilities in the hospital annexe at Wormwood Scrubs and at Glen Parva and Feltham youth custody centres. It is open to prison medical officers to refer suitable prisoners to those establishments. As the House will know, the entire activities at Grendon are directed to the treatment and personal development of prisoners with personality or psychopathic disorders. The regime is carefully monitored by a standing committee under the chairmanship of the director of the prison medical service.

A current development at Glen Parva is that two wards in the centre's hospital are being opened shortly to enable 20 youth custody trainees who are intellectually or socially handicapped to be given specialised care and support. These wards will be staffed jointly by discipline and hospital officers, under the supervision of the senior medical officer. The therapeutic unit at Parkhurst C wing, which was closed in 1979 following disturbances in a neighbouring part of the prison, reopened last December. That is further good news.

I should like to refer to the part played by staff who are of course the prime and indispensable facility. The doctor-patient relationship in prison is professionally analogous to that outside, and the medical treatment offered a prisoner is determined in each case by the clinical judgment of the individual doctor concerned. Unlike patients detained under the Mental Health Act, the prisoner is not obliged to accept that treatment, except in very special circumstances. Happily some 30 per cent. of full-time prison medical officers have psychiatric qualifications. They are assisted as necessary, as I have said, by visiting consultant psychiatrists. There are nearly 1,000 hospital officers, some 11 per cent. of whom have nursing qualifications, half of those psychiatric. Additionally, there are about 140 trained nurses. It is planned to increase that number over the coming years and to raise further the proportion with psychiatric qualifications.

Training provision is under continual review. In 1984, the Department increased from 13 to 24 weeks the length of training for hospital officers, using the whole of the additional time on instruction in nursing mentally disturbed prisoners. A talk by the president of MENCAP featured in a development seminar earlier this year for all principal and senior medical officers.

No reliable information has existed on the number of prisoners who cannot be transferred to hospital under the 1983 Act but who in varying degrees seem mentally disordered. I know that the hon. Gentleman is concerned about that. We are tackling this deficiency with a snapshot census taken by prison medical officers on the position as at 4 December 1985, and again on the position during October this year. Preliminary indications are that, of some 24,000 adult males serving six months and over, about 1,430 — or 6 per cent. — require specialised therapeutic facilities by reason of mental disorder or abnormality. Of course, about 230 are regarded as being mentally ill and 860 as having a personality disorder.

In the initial view of prison medical officers, about half of the 1,430 prisoners are regarded as being appropriately managed now. The same census suggests that of some 7,200 young males serving six months and over, about 320 require specialised therapeutic facilities, 17 are regarded as being mentally ill, and 242 are regarded as having a personality disorder. Again, prison doctors judged that about half were being appropriately managed at that time. Those two snapshots are intended for immediate management purposes. They will enable the director of prison medical services the better to assess the adequacy of current provision and to give consideration to the size, type and number of such further facilities as may be indicated, and to what additional resources might be involved.

Arrangements are also in hand for an academic research study to be undertaken by the Institute of Psychiatry. It is envisaged that this study, which is expected to start in the autumn and to take three years to complete, will objectively describe existing arrangements for the management of mentally disordered inmates, evaluate the effectiveness of those arrangements and identify where needs are not currently being met and the means by which they might be met.

I return to the important point of liaison with the Department of Health and Social Security. My noble Friend Lord Glenarthur, who is the Minister responsible for prisons, has in discussion with Lady Trumpington, his counterpart in that Department, jointly set up an interdepartmental working group to look into the problems associated with mentally disordered offenders in the prison system. That group, which is being chaired by the director of prison medical services, will have in mind the desirability of minimising the numbers of such prisoners in the system and facilitating their management and treatment in the most appropriate circumstances, both while in custody and after. This working group will consider also the preparation for release and inmates' planned acceptance back into the community. I hope that I am putting across to the hon. Gentleman that much progress is being made.

The motivation and experience of many members of the prison service of all disciplines enable a good deal to be contributed to the compassionate care of the mentally disordered in their charge. I stress again that we make no assertion of satisfaction in respect of current provision and arrangements, but I hope that the positive stance of the Government is clearly signalled by the initiatives which we have taken to get a better measure of the task and to assess what improved arrangements are desirable, while not losing sight of the general pressures in the penal system and the inevitable constraints on resources.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

Unemployment Costs

1. Mr. Boyes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the annual cost to the Exchequer of the present level of unemployment.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): The overall cost to the Exchequer of unemployment and supplementary benefit paid to the unemployed is estimated to be £5·6 billion in 1986-87. In addition, it is estimated that £1·15 billion will be paid in housing benefit, a benefit which can continue to be paid if the claimant finds employment.

Mr. Boyes: Will the Minister accept that my constituency will find that figure shocking, outrageous and wholly abhorrent because it has a large number of people unemployed, including skilled building workers, when we desperately need a new hospital in Washington, new council houses in the borough of Sunderland and new factories in Hetton and Houghton? Is this not just another example of the fact that the Government simply do not care?

Mr. MacGregor: Not at all. The hon. Gentleman referred to new hospitals.

Mr. Boyes: Not in my constituency.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman will know that the Government have a record on hospital building that is far better than under the previous Government and that expenditure on the Health Service is well up in real terms. He will also know that if we followed a prescription of very high public expenditure programmes, well beyond the ones that we are pursuing at the moment, the effect on real jobs in the economy, given the precarious situation we are in now with the massive fall in oil prices——

Mr. Hoyle: Precarious?

Mr. MacGregor: Let me explain. There is a precarious situation in the world economy where, with a fall in oil prices, if one does not pursue prudent economic policies, we could easily have higher levels of unemployment. That is what is precarious. If the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) pursued very high public spending policies, such as the Labour Opposition are suggesting, it would undoubtedly lead to a much bigger increase in unemployment and a loss of real jobs.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Is it not infantile for hon. Members, such as the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), to imply that unemployment can be reduced overall by expanding public spending, because public spending has to be paid for by increases in taxes, by interest rates, or by inflation? Every one of those will increase unemployment, not reduce it.

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend is quite right. In a world in which conditions can fluctuate very quickly, it has been our prudent economic policies which have enabled us to come through the massive fall in oil prices unscathed and which have also enabled over 1 million new jobs to be created in this country since the last election.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Will the Minister give us the full figures, not just the three he has given for unemployment, which include the loss of taxation, the loss of national insurance and increased health costs? Does he agree with the House of Lords Select Committee figure, confirmed by Professor Adrian Sinfield and others, that the true cost of unemployment is at least double what he says, and that it costs about £6,000 per year for each adult?

Mr. MacGregor: I do not agree at all. It is difficult to make any calculations of that sort. It depends on what levels of earnings are assumed for those who come off the unemployment register to take jobs. It depends on a number of other factors, including the effect that increased public expenditure, and therefore increased taxation or increased borrowing, have on real jobs in the economy. It depends on a whole range of things.

Mr. Nicholls: Is not the basis of this question even dafter than my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) suspected? If the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) had his way, either the people working on job creation schemes would have to be paid realistic wages, in which case there would be a truly massive increase in public expenditure, or the same amount of money would have to go round, and that would mean that some people would wind up without unemployment benefit.

Mr. MacGregor: Far too many simple assumptions are made about the relationship between unemployment benefits and how one can get people off the unemployment register. The prudent economic policies that we have been pursuing, which include £2·4 billion of expenditure on employment and training measures this year, is the right way to ensure steady progress and steady economic growth, and therefore an increase in real jobs.

Mr. Blair: Will the Chief Secretary comment on the latest unemployment statistics today, which show, on his own Government's figures, an underlying rise of 10,000 to 15,000 people every month on the unemployment register? Why does he not admit that after seven years in government his party has nothing to offer the unemployed except pious hopes and fiddled figures?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman will know that unemployment has been rising in nearly every country—certainly, every advanced industrial country. He will also know that the levels of youth unemployment here are well below the average in Europe, and that 1 million extra new jobs have been created in this country since the election. We are all extremely concerned about the level of unemployment, but it is necessary to get the right policies to ensure that it comes down.

Taxation and Unemployment

2. Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what comparative information is available to him on the relationship in Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries, between the burden of taxation and unemployment.

Mr. MacGregor: High taxation inhibits job creation in other OECD countries, just as in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Straw: Why does the Chief Secretary continue to mislead the House and the country about the relationship between unemployment and taxation? Has he not worked out yet that Britain's unemployment record is the worst of any of the major OECD countries, but that a number of major OECD countries have higher tax burdens and lower unemployment?

Mr. MacGregor: I am not misleading the country or the House on the first point that the hon. Gentleman made. With regard to other OECD countries, the hon. Gentleman will know that in making those comparisons one also has to look at comparative economies. When one looks at advanced economies, it is not without significance that Japan and the United States, countries with the highest growth records, also have the lowest levels of taxation. If the hon. Gentleman wants to refer to the OECD, let me refer him to the recent communiqué of OECD Ministers, which stated:

"the control of public expenditures and budget deficits is essential to establish a stable domestic financial environment and to promote a durable reduction in real interest rates which will help private investment to expand and thus promote sustained growth worldwide."

And that means jobs.

Mr. Forman: In view of the many different and complicated causes of unemployment in the OECD countries, does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the characteristics of both the Japanese and the American economies is that, through prudent policies, they have managed to maintain a relatively low burden of taxation and borrowing, which has contributed to low inflation rates, which has been good for jobs?

Mr. MacGregor: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right. Some of the studies that I have seen, which examine those matters, fail to take into account the effect on the supply side of a policy of lower taxation, which encourages enterprise and, in the long run, undoubtedly produces the jobs which a high expenditure policy would not.

Economic Policy

3. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next plans to meet his Group 5 colleagues to discuss the co-ordination of economic policies.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): The Finance Ministers of the Group of Five nations meet from time to time to discuss their economic policies and prospects.

Mr. Bennett: Does the Minister accept that one of the major problems facing the world is that of Third world countries' debt repayment? What have the Government done to help with that problem in the past few years? Is there anything that the Government can claim that they have achieved in that area? What is the hon. Gentleman pressing the other five countries to do to ease the problems of the debt of Third world countries? Does he accept that until we find a solution, things such as Sport Aid and all the other assistance from the Western world are as naught compared to those debt problems?

Mr. Stewart: As the hon. Gentleman will know, these problems are more generally discussed through the forum of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank rather than within the Group of Five. I am happy to respond to his question about the United Kingdom's contribution. Not only do we have a substantial overseas aid budget, but we have, in the case of several African countries, converted loans into outright grants. We have also taken part in discussions through international organisations which have led to the fulfilment of one of the aspects of the Baker plan, which has not perhaps received as much attention as it might, which is that the World Bank is now concentrating more of its resources, not on project lending, but on structural adjustment loans. Since the IMF meeting last year, $2·7 billion has been provided by that means in 10 loans to eight different countries.

Mr. Merchant: Is it not of greater significance that since the last G5 meeting the British economy has weathered the oil crisis elsewhere without any serious crisis, just as it weathered the miners' strike? Is this not a tribute to the underlying strength of the British economy and should that not be brought to the attention of the G5 nations?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is absolutly correct in that analysis. I am equally sure that other members of G5 recognise the importance of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer following such sound and successful financial policies.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the Minister think that one day perhaps the Western taxpayer will pick up the bill and pay for the Third world debt?

Mr. Stewart: The Western taxpayer already makes extensive contributions through national Government programmes. I have no doubt that it is right that international institutions should be the route whereby the international debt problem is resolved. The right approach is to continue to consider these matters on a case-by-case basis, which has served us well so far.

Charities

4. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much extra charitable giving he now expects to result from his Budget measures.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): Depending on the public response to the Budget proposals, it could be £120 million or even more.

Mr. Howarth: I thank my right hon. Friend for giving that dramatically encouraging figure. Will he confirm that the Government's tax concessions are geared, in that they materialise when private donations worth twice as much are made? Does he agree that enlisting charitable donations in partnership with direct public provision is a thoroughly useful and practical way of mobilising additional resources of money and dedicated people to help tackle the problems of social need?

Mr. Lamont: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is the Government's policy to encourage private giving. The figure that I gave is merely an estimate. It could be more. It is up to us as politicians to encourage people to take advantage of the unprecedented generous reliefs.

Mr. Ashton: Do the Government regard the giving of free school dinners to the children of the unemployed as charity? If so, why are they stopping local councils from having the discretion to do that? Why is there one rule for those charities in which the Government believe and another rule for the charities in which local councils believe?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman's point has nothing to do with this question. The main question is about tax relief for private charities. I am only sorry that the hon. Gentleman does not see fit to welcome a provision that is welcomed by voluntary organisations in this country.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is now up to businesses and charities to develop closer links to take full advantage of the new scheme?

Mr. Lamont: I agree completely with my hon. Friend. Charities have very much welcomed this development. It was widely agreed that the last Budget was the best Budget ever for charities.

Income Tax and National Insurance

5. Mr. Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of his gross wage a single person earning £100 per week pays in income tax and national insurance contributions.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Twenty five per cent.

Mr. Chapman: Although I appreciate that there has been a significant reduction in the tax liability of the low-paid under this Government, will my right hon. Friend confirm that it must continue to be a top priority of the Government further to reduce these tax levels, bearing in mind that a person on only half average earnings must pay a quarter of his gross salary in tax? Is that not another reason why we must control public expenditure?

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend is correct. He will recall that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in the House on 10 July that it was the Government's objective to reduce the burden of tax for those on average earnings or the lower paid. Anyone reflecting on these matters would realise that, given certain events on the other side of the Atlantic, lower-paid workers in this country might pay a higher marginal rate than American multi-millionaires. Tax cuts matter to the lower-paid. It is rather surprising that the Opposition do not give them a higher priority.

Mr. Penhaligon: Will the Minister confirm that the Government have changed the position so that less tax is now paid on an unearned £100 than on an earned £100? Can he explain the logic of that?

Mr. Lamont: We have rightly got rid of the investment income surcharge, because it was a tax on savings. The hon. Gentleman implies that there should be national insurance contributions on unearned income. That would mean that there would be no national insurance contributions, as such, but rather a social security tax. Why does he not put it that way?

Mr. Dorrell: Is it not a fact that, in addition to taxing national insurance, incentives for many people on £100 a week are also directly affected by the tapers of means-tested social security benefits? Can my right hon. Friend assure the House that in deciding those tapers, the incentive effect, when coupled with tax and national insurance, is taken into account?

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. This is an extremely serious matter and it is one of the problems that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has been addressing. We have taken some steps to meet this problem, but of course we have not solved it. We regard it as an important matter.

Mr. Hattersley: If the Government are so concerned about reducing taxes for the lower paid, why is it that over the past seven years taxes have increased for virtually everybody earning less than £500 a week and decreased for literally everybody earning more than £500 a week, as was revealed in the Minister's predecessor's answer on 20 April?

Mr. Lamont: Compared with the 1978-79 indexed regime, the proportion of incomes taken in tax and national insurance contributions is lower for every group except those on half average earnings. That one group is the exception. Below that level the proportion compares favourably with the 1978-79 indexed regime.

Profit-related Pay Schemes

6. Mr. Forth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress he is making with his discussions about profit-related pay schemes.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): A Green Paper on profit-related pay was published on Tuesday and has been widely welcomed.

Mr. Forth: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Will he confirm that profit-related pay forms a substantial element of remuneration in Japan? Does he not regard that as a most encouraging precedent for his scheme and this country? Is he, therefore, able to proceed with speed and confidence towards the fulfilment of a similar position in this country?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend makes an important point. It is customary in Japanese industry for the average Japanese employee to have a sizeable part of his total remuneration in performance bonuses, which are linked to the profitability of the company. I have little doubt that that has a positive effect on industrial relations in Japan, on the identification of employees with their companies, and on the low unemployment rate that Japan enjoys.

Mr. Skinner: How will a nurse working in the National Health Service benefit from one of these schemes?

Mr. Lawson: A nurse working in the NHS will benefit from the better performance of the national economy, and that is what the scheme is about.

Mr. Penhaligon: Is the Chancellor's main attraction to this scheme the idea of getting people involved in the profitability of their company, with which I would certainly concur, or is it the possibility that it might keep down pay claims?

Mr. Lawson: There are two objectives. One is certainly to improve identification and motivation among employees, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman, on behalf of the Liberal party, supports that. Secondly, the scheme has a beneficial effect on pay flexibility. One of the difficulties in the United Kingdom is the excessive rigidity of our pay bargaining system. The introduction of greater flexibility in this way will be beneficial, not least to those who are at present out of work.

Share Ownership

7. Mr. Leigh asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received seeking additions to his proposals to extend direct ownership of equity shares.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Some modifications to the personal equity plan have been suggested, but most have warmly welcomed the scheme as it stands.

Mr. Leigh: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, following the achievement of a property owning democracy, our central aim as Conservatives should be to achieve a share-owning society in which the majority, not just a small minority, of British people are given a real stake in the ownership of British industry? In that light, has he reached a decision on the limits which will apply to investments in unit trusts, investment trusts and the personal equity plan, and will he be as generous as possible?

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend should know that I am answering a written question today whereby the limit on investment in authorised unit trusts and approved investment trust companies under the scheme will be £420 a year or 25 per cent. of the investor's annual——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Order. That is a written answer.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. Unusual. Mr. Nellist.

Mr. Nellist: As for the question from the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) regarding a share-owning democracy, is the Minister aware that 467 shareholders own more than two-thirds of the shares of Cable and Wireless? Any other investigation of privatisation in the past seven years under this Tory Government would show that rather than creating a share owning democracy — the public as a whole had previously owned these industries — a smaller and smaller number of larger, private shareholders are raking in the benefits of privatisation.

Mr. Lamont: The purpose of the personal equity plan is to increase direct ownership of shares by individuals and to reduce the proportion owned by institutions as such. If that is what the hon. Gentleman is criticising, I very much welcome his conversion to supporting the scheme. The Government very much want to see the widest possible ownership of shares. That is why we have introduced this special relief,, which will be of particular benefit to small shareholders and people on modest incomes.

Mr. Holt: Does my right hon. Friend agree that most people would like to go into share owning but at the moment are frightened by the tactics of the Labour Opposition who suggest that they will steal back British Telecom shares at a price below their market value?

Mr. Lamont: We have all noticed that the Labour party has put forward a proposal for re-nationalisation of private companies, but it does not seem to have the guts to give it its true name. We all know that it simply amounts to the confiscation of people's shares.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Does the Minister expect the scheme to have any credibility with investors, let alone new investors, when, if they wish to dispose of their shares in a falling market, they will lose the benefits of the Exchequer arrangements? How does that have any credibility?

Mr. Lamont: I am not sure what point the right hon. Gentleman is making when he refers to a falling market. Obviously if there are no profits to be made there will be no tax relief. This scheme gives small investors the opportunity to build up, over a period of time, significant profits on which there will be tax relief. The relief given on dividends is especially important to small investors.

Mr. Sumberg: Is my right hon. Friend aware that a recent stock exchange survey has shown that share ownership has doubled under this Government? One in seven adults now have a direct stake in British industry. Is this not a good base on which the Government can build?

Mr. Lamont: I believe that it is a thoroughly desirable development. There are different estimates of the proportion of the population that own shares, but it does seem to be universally agreed, even if there are different estimates of what the position is today, that it has doubled from whatever the situation was before.

Job Creation

8. Mr. Dixon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the comparable cost per job of jobs created as a result of (a) tax cuts and (b) public spending.

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman's question is based upon a fallacy. Lasting jobs cannot be bought. What matters is the performance of the economy, and in general this is more likely to be improved by reducing the burden of taxation than by increasing Government spending.

Mr. Dixon: The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that every objective study has suggested that public expenditure is far more effective than tax cuts in creating jobs. Evidence given to the Employment Select Committee said that infrastructure investment was cheaper and quicker than tax cuts in creating jobs. This investment would also provide much needed roads, sewers, schools, hospitals and house refurbishment. When will the right hon. Gentleman concern himself with the 4 million people who are unemployed and less about putting a couple of pennies in the pockets of those who are employed?

Mr. Lawson: I recall an opinion poll recently which showed that the overwhelming majority of Labour voters wanted a reduction in the basic rate of income tax, even though Labour Members of Parliament did not. The studies to which the hon. Gentleman referred do not look at the supply side effects of either public expenditure or the reduced burden of taxation. The supply side effects are absolutely crucial in determining the performance of the economy and, therefore, the level of employment.

Mr. Dickens: Is it not right that if we take the grasping hand of the national Government and the grasping hand of local government out of people's pockets, that will benefit individuals and their families, industry and charities, which we were talking about earlier?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend characteristically puts it very well indeed.

Mr. Hoyle: Will the Chancellor and other Ministers stop sounding like a record on which the needle is stuck? Is it not true that they keep repeating the same old fallacies without there being any effect on the economy? Has the Chancellor taken account of the fact that tax relief will probably suck in imports, whereas the same money used in public spending would benefit all?

Mr. Lawson: I have to disappoint the hon. Gentleman by informing him that the facts of life and the laws of arithmetic do not change from week to week or from year to year.

Mr. Gow: If the consequence of high public expenditure is a diminution in unemployment, how is it that, under the Labour Government, when public expenditure rose massively, unemployment also doubled? Is my right hon. Friend aware that it is only by reducing the levels of taxation that we shall encourage greater activity in the economy?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. He was an especially close, astute and penetrating observer of the follies and misfortunes of the last Labour Government. He makes an important point. It was during the early period of the Labour Government—what one might call their red period, the pre-IMF period, when they were boosting public expenditure extravagantly—that unemployment doubled. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There is no solution to the problem of unemployment by increasing public expenditure, whether by the £24 billion which the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) wants, or by an even larger figure.

Mr. Terry Davis: The Chancellor referred to what a majority of Labour voters want. Is he aware that a majority of all voters want a reduction in unemployment? Everybody—the National Institute for Economic and Social Research, the Henley Centre for Forecasting, the London Business School, Cambridge Econometrics, the Select Committee on Employment and the House of Commons Library, using the Treasury's economic model—agrees that sensible increases in public expenditure provide more jobs than do tax cuts. Why will the Chancellor not change his economic policy and base it on the facts instead of on his personal prejudice?

Mr. Lawson: My policies are based on facts and not on artificial calculations by computer models or any other models.

Mr. Davis: This is the right hon. Gentleman's model.

Mr. Lawson: These are models which do not capture the supply side of the economy, which is critical to the performance of the economy and, therefore, the creation of jobs. That is what matters. It is no accident, as my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) said earlier, that the two most successful economies in the world—Japan and the United States—have the lowest proportion of gross national product taken in taxation.

Premium Bonds

9. Mr. Amess asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals have purchased premium bonds in each of the last five years; and what was the total prize money paid out in each of those years.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The number of premium bonds purchased in 1985-86 was approximately 2¼ million, and total prize money in that year was £135 million. I will arrange for the figures for earlier years to be published in the Official Report.

Mr. Amess: Is my hon. Friend satisfied with those figures, or does he agree with those who feel that premium bonds are rather old hat, with unexciting prizes and disappointing returns for the Treasury? Does he agree with those who would like a new form of national lottery?

Mr. Stewart: I do not accept what my hon. Friend says about premium bonds being unattractive or unsuccessful. Whether they are old hat is a matter of judgment. They have been going for 30 years, during which time they have accumulated very large sums of money—the current figure is about £1·8 billion—and about 24 million of our fellow citizens hold them. That can hardly be described as an unsuccessful exercise. As to lotteries, we had a debate a few years ago, and there was little support for the idea. What I think has been suggested when that idea has been put forward is that it might have a substantial effect on other forms of betting and gaming, and one cannot necessarily expect it to be a very substantial exercise in this country.

Following are the figures:

	Number of Purchases Million	Value of Prizes £ million
1981-82	3·58	101·1
1982-83	3·36	104·3
1983-84	3·44	110·2
1984-85	3·25	121·7

Privatisation

10. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his latest projections for receipts from asset sales for 1986-87.

Mr. Lawson: I expect privatisation proceeds this year to be around £4¾ billion, in line with the projections in the public expenditure White Paper.

Mrs. Clwyd: Does the Chancellor recall that when British Telecom was sold off share prices rose by £1·3 billion on the first day after privatisation? What guarantee can he give that the same thing will not happen when he sells off British Gas, or is his first priority to provide further windfalls for his friends in the City?

Mr. Lawson: So far from those profits going to friends or otherwise in the City, they went to a wide range of ordinary shareholders. Very nearly 2 million people subscribed to the highly successful privatisation of British Telecom and got shares, and 1·5 million shareholders are now told by the Labour party that if by any mischance a Labour Government are returned they would be grabbed back at 130p a share, well below the market value. That is expropriation and confiscation, and the public should know that.

Mr. Yeo: Bearing in mind the substantial proceeds received not only in the current year but in previous years from privatisation and the large increases in the price of these investments which employees and other shareholders have enjoyed, has my right hon. Friend been able to estimate the public expenditure cost of repurchasing all these shares? Does he agree that, if such a repurchase was to take place, it would be one form of public expenditure that would create not a single additional job?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right, but it would also plunge the companies that are now doing very much better than they have ever done before back into the dead hand of the state, which would be bad for the companies, bad for their employees and bad for the economy. One of the reasons why nearly every one of the companies has been privatised and stands at a higher price in the market than when it was first privatised is that, almost without exception, they have improved their profitability, their sales and their performance generally now that they are in the private sector. Therefore, we shall continue, undisturbed by these criticisms, with the privatisation of British Gas later this year and a number of other privatisations.

Mr. Hattersley: Having talked about the market value of British Telecom shares, will the Chancellor tell us why he chose to sell them below the market value, and will he give an absolute assurance that he will not waste public money in the same way with the flotation of British Gas?

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Gentleman clearly knows very little about market values, because there was no market value until they were first offered to the market. They were offered to the market at a price that the most expert advisers advised was the appropriate price at which to offer them. Since then, I am glad to say, they have appreciated. What is more, I recall the Labour party and, indeed, the right hon. Gentleman, predicting confidently that the privatisation would be a flop. In fact, it was an outstanding success, and that is what he does not like.

Competitiveness

11. Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the change in competitiveness of British exports owing to changes in the sterling exchange rate over the past 10 years.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Experience has shown that competitiveness is determined by many factors other than the exchange rate. The excessive growth of our unit labour costs currently poses the greatest threat to our future competitiveness.

Mr. Pike: Is it not a fact that interest rates in this country are still too high, which, in exchange rate terms, is putting the pound at an artificially high level, and this is putting our exports and manufacturing industries at a disadvantage compared with our competitors abroad? In view of the Conservative Government's seven years of abysmal failure in reducing unemployment, when will they take some action to get the output of our manufacturing industries above the 1979 figure and manufacturing exports in surplus compared with our imports?

Mr. Ian Stewart: The hon. Member may not have observed that since the Budget interest rates in the country have already fallen by 2½ per cent. I would also remark that manufacturing output and investment have been rising well in recent years.

Mr. Philip Oppenheim: Is it not true that those countries that have the best record in manufacturing output are those that have had Governments who have followed consistently pro-enterprise, pro-business, pro-profit, lower taxation policies, unlike this country, which has been intermittently burdened by Left-wing Socialist Governments?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Clearly the success of the British economy in the past few years has owed a great deal to the way in which this Government have been able to liberalise the economy and take off the shackles of the state and of excessive public expenditure. There is only one way in which that progress could be put at risk, and I hope that there is no chance of that. It would be if the Government were not given the chance to have not only one but many more terms ahead, so that years and generations of damage can be put right.

Manufacturing Output

12. Mr. Nellist asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next intends to meet the Trades Union Congress general council to discuss manufacturing output; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend has no plans as such to meet the Trades Union Congress general council but, of course, he regularly meets the Trades Union Congress general secretary and other members of the general council at the National Economic Development Council.

Mr. Nellist: If the Chancellor were to meet the TUC general council, would he explain how, if this is the sixth successive year of successful economic growth, the Central Statistical Office in the past few days can admit that manufacturing production has fallen again by a further 1 per cent. over the past 12 months? Is it not the case that private ownership under the Government is manifestly incapable of providing decent living standards or full employment for the majority of the population?

Mr. MacGregor: That is pretty rich coming from the hon. Gentleman. It was those of a militant nature who think and act as he does who did more harm to large parts of British manufacturing industry, and hence jobs, in the 1970s than anything else. The hon. Gentleman clearly has not noticed that, since June 1983, manufacturing output is up 8½ per cent., manufacturing investment is up 31 per cent., manufacturing exports are up in volume terms by 22½ per cent., and manufacturing productivity is up by 3½ per cent. What is more, the biggest threat to jobs and the competitiveness of industry is the way in which our unit labour costs are rising faster than those of many of our competitors. The hon. Gentleman's contribution to that problem, given his philosophy, would be nothing short of disastrous.

Mrs. Currie: If my right hon. Friend meets the TUC, will he ask it to take note of the recent numerous votes against strikes in manufacturing industry, such as the vote in British Rail Engineering Ltd., for which many of my constituents work? Is it not time that the TUC ruled out strikes, as they are the most negative, destructive and pointless way in which to negotiate in an industrial dispute?

Mr. MacGregor: The climate is different now, and not one that those such as the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) could exploit, as was done in the 1970s, with such harmful results to the British economy. My hon. Friend is right. The record on strikes is one of the most successful aspects of the British economy.

Dr. McDonald: If the British economy is so good, given the litany of statistics that the Chief Secretary has just cited, why did he say earlier that the British economy was in a precarious state due to falling oil prices?

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving me the opportunity to make clear what I said. The problem is that we now live in a precarious world where there are substantial fluctuations in economic conditions. One clear sign of the strength of the British economy is the fact that we have managed to come through a 12-month-long coal strike and a period of fast falling oil prices. We have been able to do so because we have an increasingly strong economy and the world can see that. If the policies advocated by the hon. Lady's party were pursued, with an expenditure of £24,000 million, we would move into a precarious state.

North Sea Oil Revenue

13. Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue from North sea oil in 1986-87.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the forecast my right hon. Friend published at Budget time.

Mr. Dubs: Given the Government's commitment to a market economy, does the Minister agree that a falling oil price should almost automatically lead to falling exchange rates? Why, then, do the Government persist in keeping interest rates higher than they would otherwise be merely to keep up the exchange rate of the pound?

Mr. Lamont: As I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, interest rates are determined not by oil prices but by the market and also by monetary conditions in the economy at the time.

Mr. Sumberg: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the real strength of the economy is shown by the fact that, with falling oil prices, we have not had a cash crisis or a sterling crisis and we have not had recourse to the International Monetary Fund, as we would have had under a Labour Government?

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend is right. If we had pursued the policy advocated by the Opposition of spend, spend, spend, we would undoubtedly have had an enormous crisis at various times when the oil price has been under pressure.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Dubs asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with President Mubarak of Egypt.

Mr. Dubs: Given today's hint of an impending change in Government policy on sanctions against South Africa, does the Prime Minister agree that the only just solution for that country is the eradication of apartheid and the establishment of majority rule in a united and non-fragmented South Africa, a statement to which she signed her name at the Commonwealth Heads of Governments conference in New Delhi in 1983?

The Prime Minister: Both the Nassau accord and the European Council meeting at The Hague envisaged discussion on further measures that might be needed. As I said in the House on 1 July, contingency arrangements are being made. With regard to the latter part of the question, if the hon. Gentleman reads the Commonwealth accord at Nassau he will find this sentence about getting rid of apartheid:

"We believe that we must do all we can to assist that process,"—

this is the critical part—

"while recognising that the forms of political settlement in South Africa are for the people of that country—all the people—to determine."

Mr. Whitfield: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the insistence of Mr. Colin Sampson, the chief constable of West Yorkshire, on the suspension of Mr. John Stalker as the deputy chief constable of Manchester pending the outcome of his inquiries into the activities of Mr. Stalker in Manchester, and his insistence on the suspension of two senior police officers in Northern Ireland pending the outcome of the inquiries into certain activities of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, demonstrate that Mr. Sampson is carrying out a proper and robust inquiry into both matters? Further, does my right hon. Friend agree that suggestions in the media to the contrary are at best mischievous and at worst the result of an orchestrated campaign by those who have the worst to fear from the outcome of those two most important inquiries?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, police matters in Northern Ireland are for the Chief Constable of the RUC and matters concerning Mr. Stalker are for the police complaints procedure. It would be totally wrong of me to comment on either while the procedures are in process.

Dr. Owen: On the contingency measures that the Prime Minister has just announced, which could well be the important signal that the Commonwealth needs to rescue the Commonwealth Games, will the Prime Minister make it clear that those measures are neither "immoral" nor "repugnant", and will she withdraw those very offensive remarks?

The Prime Minister: I have answered faithfully accusations made against me and about various things concerned with sanctions. Like every hon. Member, I wish to see apartheid ended at the earliest opportunity. I believe passionately that it will best be ended by negotiations. We are doing everything we can to bring those negotiations about, as the right hon. Gentleman knows. The further contingency measures were in the communiqué of the EEC. Those are not automatic. They never were automatic. They are there to be considered. I have described them as contingency measures, but they are not automatic.

Mr. Harris: Has my right hon. Friend considered what some of us regard as the disgraceful decision of this House last night in voting for a large increase of over £7,000 for secretarial allowances? If the decision is irreversible, can my right hon. Friend think of any other section of public expenditure that has increased by over 50 per cent. this year?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, the level of the allowance is a matter for the House, which voted last night for a 52 per cent. increase in the office, secretarial and research allowance. The decision was taken against the advice of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, who argued that it was wholly inappropriate to vote for such a substantial increase at the very moment when the level and structure of the secretarial allowance had been referred to the Top Salaries Review Body for general review. No doubt last night's decision will be taken into account in that review. I remind the House that the cost of Parliament, which is determined by Parliament and not by the Government, has risen from £26 million in 1978-79 to £72 million last year. The increase to which my hon. Friend has referred must be found out of the pockets of our constituents.

Q2. Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winnick: Would the Prime Minister like to comment in any way on the numerous press articles which have appeared in the past few days regarding the position of the Head of the Commonwealth and the future of that organisation? Does the right hon. Lady not agree that the Commonwealth faces its most severe crisis, largely because of her attitude? Only a few days ago she suggested that South Africa should not have been excluded from the Commonwealth in 1961. Does the right hon. Lady not realise how deeply offensive and grotesque those remarks were, coming from a British Prime Minister?

The Prime Minister: We try to influence the policies of nations with which we disagree. We seem to have taken a different view of South Africa — [Interruption.] — although we do wish to try to influence its policies to end apartheid. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We often condemn lack of free speech elsewhere. We must not deny it to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: I propose to follow the well-established practice of my predecessors and not answer questions on the Floor of the House, directly or indirectly, about the monarch.

Q3. Mr. Best asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Best: Does my right hon. Friend accept that there are many black leaders in South Africa who have different and constructive views as to what should be the change after the dismantling of apartheid? Will she take those different views into account when formulating her own policy, so that we can move the debate on to the more fruitful ground of discussion of the substance of change rather than merely any change for change's sake, without having firm ideas about its actual nature, which so often appears to be the refuge of Opposition Members?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, the African National Congress has made its views well known. A representative of the ANC met my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign Office, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), some time ago, and we know its views. We also know, and read only this morning in the newspapers, of the testimony of Chief Buthelezi, in which he said that the imposition of negative, punitive measures against Pretoria can only impair the process by which black and white are finding common cause with each other to an ever-increasing extent. Our objective is the same. It is the end of apartheid. We wish to do everything that we can to bring it to an end by negotiations, and, ultimately, that will be the way that change will come about.

Mr. Kinnock: Record unemployment figures have again been published today, amounting to three and a quarter million. For the first time since March 1983 the numbers employed have gone down. In her current review of public expenditure for next year, what will the Prime Minister do to try to ensure that the jobs that desperately need to be done can be commissioned and paid for: jobs, for instance, in the building industry, where private building is now stagnant and council house building is 70 per cent.— 90,000 houses—lower than it was when she took office in 1979?

The Prime Minister: I believe — although I do not have the press release with me — that the numbers in employment have gone up, although the right hon. Gentleman is right in saying that the unemployment figures are deeply disappointing and that the seasonally adjusted unemployment figure has gone up by 15,000, so that it has risen to 3·2 million. As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, we have done a very great deal for the unemployed. [Interruption.] This is not a matter which affects only the United Kingdom. It affects the whole of the Western world. In the last five years we have spent over £8·5 billion on employment measures and the youth training scheme. The YTS has taken more than 1 million trainees and it has now expanded to a two-year scheme. On housing, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, 1·3 million new homes have been built in Great Britain since 1979. If we take more money out of business and away from the taxpayer, what we have to take into account are the jobs that are lost and the investment that is lost by the money we take away and the return that that would give, compared with any that it would give if it were put into the public sector.

Mr. Kinnock: Is not the critical fact that at the same time as the Prime Minister has been cutting public expenditure and losing jobs in the construction industry, 1·7 million manufacturing jobs have also gone? So the equation does not work at all. Is it not the case that there are more people in long-term unemployment than there were in total unemployment when the Prime Minister took over? Will she tell us what has happened to the 2 million full-time jobs that have been lost since she became Prime Minister? Why does she not stop dodging and start building?

The Prime Minister: We have tackled some of the problems from which the right hon. Gentleman's Government ran away. If the right hon. Gentleman is suggesting that we should put back into manufacturing industry all the overmanning that was taken away, he will ruin the whole lot of industry.

Q4. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 July 1986.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Brown: Turning to the future of education, does my right hon. Friend agree that what we have to do in the coming months is to offer the prospect of choice within the state system of education to parents, and that this can best be done by ensuring that state funds for the state education system are based upon cash following the pupil? Is my right hon. Friend aware that on Thursday 24 July a group of her colleagues on this side of the House, who have produced a pamphlet called "No Turning Back", will be producing a pamphlet to be published by the Conservative Political Centre entitled, "Save our Schools"? Will she undertake to set that pamphlet as homework for the Secretary of State for Education and Science?

The Prime Minister: Yes, my hon. Friend is right. It is our purpose to give more choice to parents whose children go through the state system, which is 95 per cent. of our children. We wish to give to those parents more choice of schools, particularly as some children in some city centres have to resist political indoctrination and do not get the teaching that they deserve. My hon. Friend has illustrated one way in which it will be possible to do that. I shall certainly add the pamphlet to my own homework and that of the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Q5. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ross: Will the Prime Minister take time today to send a clear statement to the Heads of Government of the front-line states, who will meet tomorrow in Harare, that she is absolutely totally committed to the statement issued by the recent EEC summit, in order not only to preserve and save the Commonwealth, but to save the Commonwealth Games?

The Prime Minister: The Commonwealth Games are a matter for the Commonwealth Federation. They are not a matter for me. We have faithfully carried out the Commonwealth accord and we shall also faithfully carry out the EEC statement. It is important, as we have made clear all along, that any action which is taken should be considered not only by the Commonwealth and the EEC but by all the Western industrialised countries. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary left to discuss matters further in Washington today.

Q6. Mr. Batiste asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Batiste: Has my right hon. Friend had the opportunity of looking at the pamphlets about the miners' strike and the Falklands war which I sent to her office recently? Is she aware that those pamphlets, circulating in schools in my constituency and elsewhere in Yorkshire, were collected by concerned trade unionists, who were appalled at the level of political propaganda that they represented? Does she share their concern, and what is to be done about the offensive remarks made about her and about the British interest? What will she do about the continuing attack upon freedom of education in our country by the Left?

The Prime Minister: I and a number of my colleagues saw those two pamphlets, which were utterly disgraceful. They were nothing to do with education and I am amazed that they properly came within anyone's education budget. My hon. Friend will be aware that the other place has been trying to do something to exclude political indoctrination from schools. The matter will shortly come before the House and we shall express our view upon that clause, I hope forcefully, and keep it in the Bill.

Mr. Jim Spicer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise directly out of these questions?

Mr. Spicer: Yes. You may recollect, Mr. Speaker, that on Tuesday I attempted——

Mr. Speaker: Today or Tuesday?

Mr. Spicer: Tuesday.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take it later.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir.

The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 21 JULY—Opposition Day (15th Allotted Day, 2nd Part). Until seven o'clock there will be a debate on an opposition motion entitled "The Fight Against Crime—Putting People First". Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Gas Bill.

Remaining stages of the Rate Support Grants Bill.

Proceedings on the Insolvency Bill [Lords] and the Company Directors Disqualification Bill [Lords] which are both consolidation measures and were previously announced for Friday 18 July.

TUESDAY 22 JULY—Remaining stages of the Education Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 23 JULY—Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Social Security Bill, the Wages Bill and the Agriculture Bill.

THURSDAY 24 JULY—Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill.

Motion for the summer Adjournment.

Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Building Societies Bill.

FRIDAY 25 JULY—Debates on the motion for the Adjournment.

The House may also be asked to consider any other Lords amendments and messages which may be received.

The House will wish to know, Mr. Speaker, that subject to the progress of business it will be proposed that the House should rise for the summer adjournment on Friday 25 July until Tuesday 21 October.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman.

Why is the Gas Bill being taken on Monday when the Bill, as amended by the Lords, will not be available until tomorrow at the earliest? They are important amendments and an inadequate opportunity is being given to the House to attend to those amendments before the Bill is debated.

Why have the Government not yet published the supplementary benefit single payments orders? That new legislation, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, will deny funds to the very poorest families who need help with buying essential household items. Is the delay due to the fact that the Government's own Social Security Advisory Committee has strongly criticised the Bill, or are the Government simply embarrassed about the idea of introducing such legislation when it will serve only to add further misery to the very poor?

Last week, I said that a few hours' debate on the Social Security Bill on royal wedding day would not do justice to the millions of poor and elderly people whom the Bill affects. The Leader of the House gave me a homily about the royal wedding day being an ordinary working day. Although that is obviously true, is it not also true that on that day the press will be completely preoccupied with the nuptials, and that that is why the Government have chosen to introduce this miserable legislation then? It is a dirty trick that is quite unworthy of the Leader of the House. I must ask him, even now, to consider moving that debate to another day.

May I ask the Leader of the House again to guarantee that there will be a full statement on the future of the Leyland Bus and Truck Division before the House rises for the summer? The matter is under serious consideration, and it is obviously necessary for the workers and for their representatives of all parties in the House to have before the recess a clear idea of the Government's view.

The Defence Committee's report on the Westland affair is due to be published at 11 am next Thursday. Reports so far indicate that the Committee has come to conclusions that are highly critical of the duplicity and dubious conduct of the Government and of some of their servants. Will the right hon. Gentleman give an absolute assurance that we shall have a chance to debate that report in the current Session?

In relation to this week's business, do the Government intend to proceed with the debate tomorrow on the Dockyard Services Bill, or is it further evidence of the Government's shambles that they are going to drop the Bill?

Mr. Biffen: I shall respond to those six points in the order in which they were presented. I take note of what the right hon. Gentleman has said about the consideration of Lords amendments to the Gas Bill. I recognise that there is a constriction on time, but I am sure that he also realises that if the House is to rise by next Friday—I felt that there was general approval of that proposition—there are clearly difficulties in spacing the programme in an ideal way.

I have not announced a debate on the single payments orders next week. If it is decided to proceed, an announcement will be made in due course.

Of course, the date chosen for debating the Social Security Bill could give rise to difficulties for the right hon. Gentleman, and I quite understand that he would prefer it not to be discussed then. But I assure him that the last consideration was the impact that that might have on press coverage of it. However, if he would like to have the matter considered through the usual channels, he knows that I am always courteous, if not always accommodating.

The right hon. Gentleman asked for a statement on the Leyland Bus and Truck Division. I note his request, and I shall consult my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The right hon. Gentleman will understand that the publication of the Select Committee's report on Westland helicopters is the responsibility of that Committee. I note that he would like a debate on that report in the current Session. That is a reasonable request, but perhaps we can look at it through the usual channels.

Following discussions, it has been decided not to proceed with the Dockyard Services Bill tomorrow, contrary to the previous announcement, but to consider Lords amendments at another time, probably during the course of next week. That indicates not a shambles but reasonable flexibility.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): The Peacock report poses important questions on public service broadcasting which need to be answered. Will there be a debate on that report in the spill-over period when we return after the recess rather than leaving it to the vagaries of the new Session?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a question which was put to me last week. This shows the continuing interest in having reasonably soon a debate on the Peacock report.

I would not wish to commit myself irrevocably to saying that such a debate will be held in the spill-over period, but I shall bear in mind my hon. Friend's preference.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Even allowing for the disarray in the Government's programme, surely the right hon. Gentleman's statement is without precedent. He has effectively changed the business of the House without making a business statement. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman, in answering the Leader of the Opposition, to say that the House is no longer proceeding tomorrow with the Dockyards Services Bill, but why did he not make that clear in his initial statement? I shall pursue this matter at a further date, Mr. Speaker, unless the Leader of the House will explain why he acted in this extraordinary manner.

Mr. Biffen: There is nothing unusual, extraordinary or offensive about making the point in the way I did. I realise that the right hon. Gentleman has a constituency interest in this matter. I should be happy to keep him fully involved on the timing of the consideration of the Lords amendments.

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): Did I hear my right hon. Friend aright. I believe that he said that on Thursday we shall first debate the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill and then debate the motion for the summer Adjournment. When shall we start debating the motion for the Adjournment for the summer recess?

Mr. Biffen: The proceedings on the Consolidated Fund are purely formal. The motion for the summer Adjournment will then be debated. The timing will depend on what time is given to statements, private notice questions, or whatever. On any reasonable basis, my hon. Friend may expect the debate on the Adjournment for the summer recess to start no later than 5 pm. At the conclusion of the three-hour debate on the summer Adjournment motion, the House will consider Lords amendments to the Building Societies Bill.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Has the Leader of the House seen my early-day motion on compensation for Mr. Jim Smith of Aish and Company, the whistle blower?

[That this House positively supports paragraphs 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 of the Twenty-third Report of the Public Accounts Committee entitled Production Costs of Defence Equipment, on the subject of Post Costing of Contracts with Aish and Company; supports in particular paragraphs (x) and (xi) in the Report's recommendations which state:

'(x) We note that MoD officials responsible for contracts with Aish and Company did not begin to appreciate the possible extent of excess profits until the meeting with the company in March 1982. We conclude that the information provided to MoD by the two former employees probably did have a material effect on the MoD's post costing activities at this firm (paragraph 39).

(xi) We note that Treasury and MoD do not rule out the possibility of compensation to individuals who have helped MoD to identify possible excess profits but that the value and propriety of any compensation proposals would need to be considered very carefully (paragraph 40)'; and believes that compensation should be paid for loss of income and professional opportunity arising from whistleblowing in the case of Aish and Company.'.]

The motion was signed by 231 hon. Members within two days and I confidently expect 300 signatories by next week. Will the right hon. Gentleman raise the issue with his colleagues in Cabinet and impress upon them the fact that the House of Commons has spoken on this matter?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is a greatly experienced parliamentarian and constitutionalist. He knows perfectly well that it would be improper for me to reveal what I may or may not say in Cabinet. I assure him that I have taken account of his early-day motion. This is within the purview of the Public Accounts Committee. The Treasury's comments on that will be made in due course.I hope that the matter can be further considered within that framework.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Following my right hon. Friend's generally sympathetic response to me last week, has he come any nearer to persuading my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make a statement to the House next week on what he will do to keep out Greek cement imports, which are a threat to our cement industry?

Mr. Biffen: At this time of the year, sympathy is about the only commodity I have left. I understand and admire the way in which my hon. Friend pursues this problem which affects his constituency. I shall be in touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, but I would not wish to hold out an easy promise of a statement next week.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Last night, after a debate and two votes, a clear decision was made by the House on the motions dealing with Members' secretarial allowance. Despite the rather odd remarks by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and the Prime Minister, will the Leader of the House take this opportunity to confirm the Government's acceptance of the will and decision of the House? Will he confirm that Government authority has been given, or will soon be given, to the Accountant to make the necessary payments?

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for raising this matter. I am sure that he will confirm that it is totally without collusion. Last night I said that I thought it unwise of the House to act in the way that it did —on reflection, I think that that was a masterpiece of understatement. However, the decision of the House, having been clearly indicated, will be put into effect.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): My right hon. Friend may have read the debate on the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill which lasted almost two days. Many anomalies were quoted by hon. Members from both sides of the House. The main problem was that there was an understanding that the Government do not have a ports policy. That lie should be put to rest by the Government using half a day to discuss a ports policy for the United Kingdom and stopping the investment of capital in various ports, where there is no hope of getting any further trade.

Mr. Biffen: I take the point made by my hon. Friend. With his constituency interest, he addresses himself to it with authority. I will pass his comment on to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I am sure that my hon. Friend will appreciate that we cannot seriously consider the prospect of a debate before the spill-over at the earliest.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): As the right hon. Gentleman is apparently showing considerable skill in shedding various embarrassing pieces of Government legislation next week, and getting the House away at a reasonably early date, may we have an absolute guarantee that, if at the Commonwealth conference there is the danger of a crisis in which any member of the Commonwealth wishes to leave the Commonwealth, the House of Commons will be recalled at once?

Mr. Biffen: I will not speculate as to the spirit in which the House would return given the circumstances outlined by the right hon. Gentleman. He knows perfectly well that Standing Order No. 143 prescribes the circumstances for the recall of Parliament, and that is what would be observed.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Has the attention of my right hon. Friend been drawn to early-day motion 254 which relates to a group of public service pensioners who are not allowed to count their war service to the credit of their pension because the public service was carried out abroad?

[That this House believes that overseas Civil Service pensioners should be allowed to count war service towards their pension entitlement in the same way as every other branch of the public service; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to do justice towards a small number of mostly elderly people whose working lives were spent abroad in the service of the Crown.]

Will he arrange for a Minister to make a statement on that matter next week and thus remedy an injustice done to a small group of mostly elderly persons whose working lives were spent abroad, often in adverse conditions, in the service of this nation?

Mr. Biffen: I am aware of the point that my hon. Friend makes because I suspect that I heard it from his own lips a few weeks ago. I shall look into the matter and will be in touch.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Reverting to the subject raised by the Leader of the Opposition relating to social security regulations dealing with single payments, will the Leader of the House confirm that last week the Prime Minister guaranteed a debate on that subject before the summer recess? Will he confirm that, since these regulations are subject to negative procedure, it would be unacceptable to have them laid on that table and then implemented during the summer recess and not to have the debate on the attendant Social Security Advisory Committee report until the autumn? Does he not think that that would be totally unreasonable?

Mr. Biffen: I have before me the exchanges between the hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I took account of them in the remarks I made to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): May I prefix my question to the Leader of the House by congratulating you, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the House and my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) on the outstanding success of your regatta? It was quite magnificent. Although the team for which I rowed was robbed because of a decision of the Leader of the House, although I got my own back later yesterday evening, may I say that it was magnificent occasion which I hope will be repeated?

Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the multi-fibre arrangement? The European mandate on the multi-fibre arrangement, which could effect the jobs of 500,000 people in this country and many major industries in important regions of this country, is to be decided by the end of this month. Will he try to find time next week, which will be very busy, so that the people who represent textile and clothing areas can ensure that the Government are aware of the views of those who elected them and of the industries which are important to their constituencies?

Mr. Biffen: On this occasion, my hon. Friend has once again established himself as an aquatic optimist. If my facilities as a starter are somewhat suspect, I understand that they were surpassed in that respect by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Looking at the programme for next week and the Government business that it contains, I cannot easily promise my hon. Friend that which he seeks, but I suggest that he tries his luck in the debate on Friday 25 July.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Further to yesterday's private notice question, will the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland give an assurance to the House that during the long summer recess Catholic areas will be protected by the security forces from those bigoted, cowardly Orange thugs?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's interest in the affairs of the Province. He will understand that yesterday's private notice question enabled the House to consider the more immediate difficulties. I shall pass on his comments to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Will my right hon. Friend please say when he can find time for us to debate the excellent early-day motion 1134, in the name of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon), four other hon. Members and myself?

[That this House urges Her Majesty's Government to divert aid presently intended for Ghana, Kenya, Nigeria, Tanzania and Uganda to the provision of education and other assistance for the black population of South Africa.]

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the aid programme is under continuous review by the Foreign Office. I suggest that my hon. Friend might also like to try to secure a debate on 25 July when he can make his points further; otherwise he might consider the motion for the summer Adjournment itself.

Mr. John Home Robertson: (East Lothian): I understand that there may be some congestion on the streets of Westminster on Wednesday. May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to the fact that the House resolved on 6 November

"That the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis do take care that during the Session of Parliament the passages through the streets leading to the House be kept free and open and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House".—[Official Report, 6 November 1985; Vol. 86, c. 2.]

Will the Leader of the House remind the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis of that fact in view of the important business that the right hon. Gentleman says we have to transact on that day?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman views the monarchy with all the enthusiasm of John Knox. I shall consider the point he has made.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): May I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement about tomorrow's business, because we can all get back to our constituencies much earlier? However, can he guide me as to what we shall be debating in the light of the fact that the Dockyard Services Bill has gone, and the two consolidation measures have gone? What will be discussed? Is he open to any suggestions?

Mr. Biffen: As it is a festive time of the year, it is a surprise day.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Leader of the House ask the Home Secretary to conduct an urgent inquiry into the conditions at Heathrow to which many visitors to this country are subjected? Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that scores of visitors every week, who are required to have interviews with immigration officers, are compelled to stay, often for more than 24 hours, in cramped facilities without the opportunity of sleeping or eating, and that recently the number included a 14-year-old boy? Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that immigration officers, who are grotesquely understaffed, are extremely concerned at the indignities and discomfort to which many visitors are put by those outrageous arrangements? Will he ask the Home Secretary to conduct an urgent inquiry to ensure that those indignities and inconveniencies are removed as quickly as possible?

Mr. Biffen: I could not accept the hon. Gentleman's remarks as a premise to any action that I would undertake. However, I appreciate that the matter is causing great concern, and I shall refer it to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Does my right hon. Friend share my concern at the high divorce rate, the falling standards in family life and the lack of morals? Does he not agree that religious education is failing in many of our schools and that the allegations and leaks coming out of one of our committees on education that morning assembly may be done away with would be the thin end of the wedge? Will my right hon. Friend find time either next week or when we return after the recess to debate the important need for all children in Leicester and elsewhere to benefit from the collective act of worship and to learn the good and human decency of a Christian denomination?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend outlines a view which will be widely shared in the House and in Leicester. I understand that his specific point relates to the findings of a departmental Select Committee. Perhaps we should wait for its report to be published.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House make a few inquiries about the attitude of some Departments and Ministers who are not replying to Labour Members' letters? Does he know, for instance, that I wrote on 21 May to the Home Secretary about the plight of Terry French, a miner put in gaol for five years for doing little or nothing during the strike? He is likely to remain there until 1987 unless parole is allowed. The Home Secretary has not even had the decency to reply to my request of 21 May for parole for Terry French to be reviewed. I wrote to the Home Secretary again on 12 June, but I did not get very far. I have written again.

It is time that the Government had the decency to deal with these matters. I know that the Home Secretary is supposed to be a novelist, but I do not expect a novel in reply. I expect a simple answer. Will the Leader of the House do something about it?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman never writes to me.

Mr. Skinner: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong. I wrote 25 days ago.

Mr. Biffen: I must be a good correspondent. I will look into the matter and bring the hon. Gentleman's point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Bearing in mind the result of the vote taken last night about support for Members of Parliament and the brevity of that debate, will my right hon. Friend consider allowing an early debate, possibly in October, on the role of the Member of Parliament, the role of Parliament and the balance of power between Parliament and the Executive? That is the issue to which we should have addressed ourselves in yesterday's debate.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has made an extremely valid point about the need for a wide-ranging assessment of the effectiveness and the role of the hon. Member and this House, and the extent to which public funds are used to support that function. Initially, that issue might be appropriate for a private Member's day.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am always reluctant to curtail business questions. I will call those hon. Members who have been standing. However, I ask for brief questions as we have a heavy day's business today.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Is the Leader of the House aware that many of us have spent many hours on the Salmon Bill and that many constructive suggestions were put forward, not least by the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) and others? In the meantime, during the summer, will he prevail upon his ministerial colleagues to take account of the real changes that we have urged? There is no chance of the Bill being dropped, is there?

Mr. Biffen: I will bear the hon. Gentleman's point in mind and will bring it to the notice of my ministerial colleagues.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Does the Leader of the House agree that the time has come for the House to debate the present circumstances and the future of the British fishing industry in the light of the proposed structural changes in Europe?

Mr. Biffen: That is certainly one of the many potential subjects for debate which compete for a rapidly diminishing amount of parliamentary time. However, I will bear it in mind.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Has the Leader of the House considered that next Wednesday's business is an exercise in hypocrisy and clearly shows the divided nature of Britain under the Tory Government? Viscount Althorp, the brother of Princess Di, will receive a reported £10,000 for a few hours of television commentary, while the Government will say that more than 500,000 young workers, all within a year or two of his age, earning £40 to £50 are pricing themselves out of work, and that the single needs payments for the 4 million elderly and unemployed people on supplementary benefit are to be removed. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that Wednesday will be the most shameful day in my three years as a Member of this House under his tutelage as Leader of the House?

Mr. Biffen: I am flattered that all that happened under my tutelage. I thought that I had a rather more passive role —at least, that is what I thought last night. I take note of what the hon. Gentleman says, but his anger should be directed more to television companies than to hon. Members.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): May I echo the appeal of my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) about the choice of Wednesday for the consideration of the Social Security Bill? Given the congestion in central London that day, what facilities will be provided to the many disabled people who will wish to use the dial-a-ride service to get to the House to lobby their Member of Parliament? Is it not wholly immoral and obscene to consider a Bill intended to hammer the poor on the day of the much publicised wedding of a rich man?

Mr. Biffen: No; I do not accept that analysis. The Bill stands to be considered and it is a major Bill in its own right. These remarks about the royal wedding are extraneous and invidious.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity today to read the article in the Financial Times by Richard Evans entitled "Higher charges buoy up water profits"? He shows the massive profits made by water companies. The Northumbrian water authority increased its profits seven times and Thames water authority, on an increased turnover of £46 million, has made profits of £45 million. That has caused the chairman of Thames Water, Mr. Roy Watts, to say: "the Treasury takes too much." Does that not demonstrate that the water authorities are being used as covert tax collectors for the Treasury, which forces them to make unacceptable, unwanted and unnecessary price increases?

Mr. Biffen: I am intrigued that articles in the Financial Times have now become source material for the Labour party. I cannot comment on their accuracy or otherwise, but the Secretary of State for the Environment will be top for questions on 23 July and I suggest that the hon. Gentleman takes up the matter with him then.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Did the Leader of the House take the opportunity today to read the joint report issued by the Office of Health Economics and MENCAP which shows a clear correlation between poverty and instances of mental handicap? Will he use his influence to ensure that legislation passed by the House in this Session is implemented with the greatest possible speed?

Mr. Biffen: I have not seen the report, but I shall make it my business to be acquainted with it. The hon. Gentleman will know the circumstances in which legislation receives the Royal Assent. So far as its being brought into effect is concerned, I can add nothing to that.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Is there any prospect of a debate on the grave and growing shortage of hospital beds which has led to complaints from my constituents both about the danger of dying because they are in need of heart surgery which they cannot get, and about remaining in constant pain because they cannot get surgery for hip replacements and other painful illness? The relatives of two people died because they were not admitted to hospital in time. Is there any hope of a debate about the need for more resources for the National Health Service? Can it please not be delayed until we return in the autumn, because too many people will be dead by then as a result of these shortages?

Mr. Biffen: As the hon. and learned Gentleman says that there is an imperative about the timing of such a debate, the best I can do is to draw his attention to the opportunities available to him on both 24 and 25 July.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Is the Leader of the House aware that, despite the recent optimistic noises about a comprehensive test ban treaty, the United States Government intend tomorrow morning, at 4 o'clock our time, to carry out a nuclear test in the Nevada desert? In those circumstances, should there not be a debate about a possible comprehensive test ban treaty before we rise for the summer recess?

Mr. Biffen: I doubt whether a debate would do much about the putting into effect of the intended American test, so I suggest that we might consider the debate at a more leisurely time.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is the Leader of the House aware that it is more than seven months since Rupert Murdoch engineered a strike at News International, and that that dispute has cost London ratepayers about £1·5 million for the extra policing? Is he aware of the serious disruption it has caused to people living in the east end? Is he further aware that Rupert Murdoch is entirely responsible for that dispute, and that it is about time we had a proper opportunity in the House to discuss the dispute—or does he not care about it?

Mr. Biffen: I am aware that seven months of aggressive intimidation have failed, and I am aware of the despair that that causes to the far Left.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Is the Leader of the House aware of the abuse which the Scottish Office perpetrated on the Scottish Grand Committee by using the occasion of a debate on Scottish industry to make a statement which should have been delivered from the Dispatch Box this afternoon, given that the implications of the issue extend north and south of the border? There were strong feelings in the Committee that it was a disgraceful performance by the Government— [Laughter.] The Secretary of State for Scotland need not laugh, because he was not even present. Will the Leader of the House investigate the matter and find out whether an apology would be in order?

Mr. Biffen: I have always comforted myself by believing that the proceedings of the Scottish Grand Committee were no responsibility of mine. But, in the spirit of good natured concern for the kingdom of the north, I shall look into that matter.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Obviously, I am being victimised for not wearing a tie.

Does not the Leader of the House agree that it is in particularly bad taste to debate the clobbering of the poor on Wednesday at the very time when there is to be the most vulgar display of wealth and extravagance, largely at public expense, within a mile of this building? Does that not show that the Government's policies are completely successful in dividing the nation?

Mr. Biffen: Vulgarity exists in the eye of the beholder.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): When the Leader of the House speaks to the Home Secretary about the plight of Terry French who is unjustly being held in Maidstone prison as a result of the miners' strike, will he remind the Home Secretary that many hon. Members and I have already written to him about that case and are still waiting for a response?

Will the Leader of the House find time before Thursday 24 July to allow the House to debate the future of the school meals service in Buckinghamshire where the Conservative-controlled county council is proposing to abolish that service, thus preventing children from getting a decent lunch, forcing their parents to spend more money on feeding them and forcing school meal workers on the dole, the day after the most disgusting display of conspicuous wealth that the country has seen in a decade?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman used the word "unjustly", and in so doing he prejudges one's view of the processes of law. I cannot accept that, and I do not think that he enhances his case by making those observations. If the hon. Gentleman genuinely wishes to raise on the Floor of the House the matter of the affairs in Buckinghamshire, he will have the opportunity to do so on 24 and 25 July.

Leader of the Opposition

4.8 pm

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You may remember that immediately after Prime Minister's questions on Tuesday I attempted to raise a point of order which related directly to the conduct of the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock)? At one point during an exchange with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister when Chief Minister Buthelezi was mentioned, the right hon. Gentleman gave a Fascist salute from a sedentary position, implying that Chief Minister Buthelezi was a Fascist. When he was questioned about Inkatha, again from a sedentary position he said that this, too, was a Fascist party. I wonder whether you could give him an opportunity to withdraw what is an obvious slur on a man who is respected throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not hear those remarks. I must say to the House again that my microphones are tuned to whoever happens to be speaking. I do not hear a lot of what goes on in the Chamber; perhaps that is just as well. Nor did I see any salutes of that nature.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. With respect to the views that you have just expressed, I can assure you that the Leader of the Opposition did give a Fascist salute from a sedentary position on Tuesday. It occurred during questions to the Prime Minister which are dealt with in column 849 of Hansard——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As it is not recorded in Hansard, how would anybody know? I must say to both hon. Gentlemen that this is old hat—[Interruption.] Order. This should have been raised on Tuesday.

Mr. Winterton: It was indeed raised on Tuesday by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer)——

Mr. Speaker: Order. No, it was not raised on Tuesday. I said to the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) that I would take his point of order at the usual time but he was not in the Chamber at the appropriate moment to raise it——

Mr. Winterton: He was.

Mr. Speaker: Well, if he was he did not raise that point of order. I cannot accept it now.

Mr. Winterton rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. With the best will in the world, we cannot go back on what happened earlier in the week. I will allow the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) to finish his point of order and then that is the end of it.

Mr. Winterton: If you did not hear what went on, Mr. Speaker, many of my hon. Friends and certainly the Press Gallery did. An article appeared in The Sun newspaper the following day—[Interruption.].

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have a very heavy day. Let the hon. Gentleman finish.

Mr. Winterton: —in which it is alleged—I did not interpret it in that way — that the Leader of the Opposition directed a Fascist salute at me and shouted

[Mr. Winterton]

"Fascist". I do not believe that that remark was directed in my direction. If it was, I believe the right hon. Gentleman would wish to apologise, because he has no grounds for making that remark. Irrespective of that, if he did direct that remark, inadvertently, in an uncontrolled moment, at the leader of the largest group of blacks in South Africa, Chief Gatsha Buthelezi of the Inkatha party, he should also seek an opportunity to apologise to that very distinguished leader of African opinion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed the hon. Member to finish in order that we can get on. In this place we cannot rake over events that may have happened earlier in the week simply because of a report in a newspaper.

I have three short statements to make. In the light of the announcement made by the Leader of the House of the proposed dates of return from the recess, questions for oral answer on Tuesday 21 October, Wednesday 22 October and Thursday 23 October may be tabled forthwith. I have directed the Table Office that the shuffles for questions for oral answer on these days be held——

Mr. Winterton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet.

I have directed the Table Office that shuffles for questions for oral answer on these days be held at 6 pm tonight.

I remind the House that on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Friday 25 July up to eight Members may raise subjects of their own choice with Ministers. Applications should reach my office by 10 pm on Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the results made known as soon as possible thereafter.

I have to make a further short statement about the arrangements for the debate on the motion for the Adjournment which will follow the passing of the Consolidated Fund Bill on 24 July. Members should submit their subjects to my office not later than 9 am on Wednesday 23 July. A list showing the subjects and times will be published later that day. Normally, the time allotted will not exceed 1½ hours but I propose to exercise discretion to allow one or two debates to continue for rather longer, up to a maximum of three hours. Where identical or similar subjects have been entered by different Members whose names are drawn in the ballot only the first name will appear on the list. As some debates may not last the full time allotted to them it is the responsibility of Members to keep in touch with developments if they are not to miss their turn.

Mr. Winterton: On a new point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the presence of many Members on this side of the House the Leader of the Opposition has just implied—I am convinced I will be supported by Members on the Tory Benches—that I have been in receipt of funds or money from South Africa or other organisations associated with South Africa. I deny that and I challenge the Leader of the Opposition to withdraw it. It is an unfounded slur which I very much regret and which I cannot believe he intends.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not hear anything of that kind——

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle) rose——

Mr. Speaker: I do not need any help. I have not finished. I think that if the Leader of the Opposition did happen to say anything of that kind he would wish to deny it.

Mr. Leigh: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I distinctly heard the Leader of the Opposition say "Boyo, you got paid."

Mr. Speaker: Order. Yesterday the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) quite correctly made some complimentary remarks about the good spirit of the regatta. Let us proceed today in that same good nature —[Interruption.] Order. It is not worth creating a great row about something that may have happened earlier in the week. Let us move on.

Mr. Winterton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been accused——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to contain himself. Statement, the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Winterton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would be very reluctant at this stage in the Session to ask the hon. Member to withdraw but I must now ask him to resume his seat. I call the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Winterton: Disgraceful.

Tertiary Education (Scotland)

4.17 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement following consultations on the Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council's report on a future strategy for higher education in Scotland, which was published on 9 December 1985.

First, I wish to thank the council for its work. Its report has stimulated wide debate, and there has been particular interest in its proposals with regard to the number of colleges of education in Scotland and future arrangements for the planning and funding of higher education. In these two important areas my conclusions are as follows.

The council endorses the vocational character of the colleges of education and recommends that teacher training should continue to be provided in specialist institutions. I accept that recommendation in principle, while not ruling out entirely the possibility of some other arrangement if circumstances appeared to warrant it. I agree also with the council that there is a very real problem of over-capacity in the colleges, which militates against the best use of the available resources and which must be reduced. The present accommodation will substantially exceed expected demand even in the 1990s, when student numbers are expected to increase to some extent. I consider, however, that there would be merit in seeking to retain, if practicable, a fairly wide geographical spread of provision. I have accordingly decided against closure of any college of education and I intend to seek to achieve the necessary capacity reductions in other ways.

I have reached the following decisions. First, the training of physical education teachers, both men and women, will be centralised on the site of the present Dunfermline college of physical education, and accordingly the training of men PE teachers at Jordanhill college of education will cease. Dunfermline college will itself be merged with Moray House college of education under a single governing body.

Secondly, Aberdeen and Dundee colleges of education will be merged on their existing sites under a single governing body.

Thirdly, the detailed arrangements for bringing these organisational changes into effect will be a matter for discussion between my Department and the governing bodies concerned.

Fourthly, I shall expect all colleges of education, whether or not directly affected by the organisational changes, to take early and strenuous measures to dispose of surplus accommodation on any of their sites, whether for educational or for other use. This will require the co-operation of the colleges themselves, the local authorities and other interests.

Fifthly, my Department will undertake a further programme of course rationalisation designed to make the best possible use of manpower and facilities throughout the college of education sector as a whole, including those colleges — Craigie and St. Andrew's — which are not otherwise directly affected by the organisational changes. I shall review the position again next year in the light of progress made. I must make it clear that, if over-capacity remains a real problem, site closures will then become inevitable.

I believe that it would be appropriate also, as the council recommended, to review the continuation of teacher training at the University of Stirling. I shall be discussing the most suitable form of this review with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science, involving the University Grants Committee as appropriate.

As for the planning and funding of higher education in Scotland, I accept the council's view that there is scope for improvement in the existing arrangements for the planning and co-ordination of provision across the university and non-university sectors. I agree that there is a gap in the planning process which could better be bridged.

I accept the council's rejection of a planning body for the public sector of higher education only, the bulk of which in Scotland is directly funded by central Government. The situation is different from that obtaining in England and Wales and a planning body for the public sector alone is not required in Scotland. I agree also that the Northern Ireland model would not be appropriate.

Nevertheless, it does not seem sensible to proceed immediately to the establishment of an overarching planning body in Scotland with responsibility for the planning and co-ordination of provision across both the university and the public sectors. Like the council, I regard it as important that planning mechanisms should be backed by appropriate systems for the delivery of results. I have therefore decided to defer a decision on the establishment of such a body until the Government can form a clear view of the future funding arrangements for the Scottish universities. This will require advice, which has already been sought, from the committee chaired by Lord Croham, which is reviewing the UGC, and also from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. I am in touch with my right hon. Friend and he will be seeking the ABRC's views shortly. The Government will consider the advisory council's recommendations in respect of planning and funding arrangements for Scottish higher education in the light of the further advice received. I have today given the Government's response to the advisory council's many other detailed recommendations in a written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Corrie).

Finally, to allow time for decisions to be taken on planning and funding arrangements, I am asking the Members of the advisory council to serve for one further year until July 1987. This will also enable the council to complete its review of the Scottish Business School, which the chairman now expects will not be possible until late this year. I shall make a further statement to the House when decisions on the matters outstanding are reached.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Any welcome that I give the statement is largely based on what it does not contain. It is tentative and seems confused. The theme is, "I accept this and that, while not entirely ruling out the other." We welcome the fact that no college closures are being announced today and that the Government have accepted, even if half-heartedly, the arguments about the value of the present structure, which is spread geographically throughout Scotland.

Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell me what is meant by the sentence about site closures becoming inevitable if over-capacity remains a real problem? How will that be handled? It is still a threat hanging over every college in Scotland. It cannot be a matter of student numbers, because we know what student numbers will be in a year's time. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give every college a target, or will he leave it to boards of governors to cut as they think fit and make an arbitrary judgment at the end? Will a benchmark be set? Is it a matter of cost savings or of building closures? That is a key part of the statement and the right hon. and learned Gentleman must tell us a little more about how it will be judged when the time comes in one short year.

Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that there will be widespread regret at the decision to close the Scottish school of physical education at Jordanhill? It has an honourable place in Scottish education, high standards and an excellent record. Opposition Members recognise the need to integrate the teaching of physical education for men and women—I am not quarrelling with that—but there will be widespread disappointment at the loss of a site with the closure of physical education at Jordanhill.

Do the Government intend that all academic staff should transfer, or will there be job losses? Equally important, can the right hon. and learned Gentleman give any indication of what will happen to other staff who will be involved because of the closure? I understand that there are about 300 students at Dunfermline and about 180 in the physical education department at Jordanhill. What will be the expected student numbers in the combined college when it is established?

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman publish in full the factors and considerations, and a summary of the advice that he received, on which the decision was taken so that the many people who regret what has happened can examine the possibilities of continuing to operate physical education units on both sites? We would have liked to receive such information. We do not know why it was ruled out. The Secretary of State should make that clear.

What about the decision to merge the management of the colleges at Dundee and Aberdeen, while retaining the two sites? The Secretary of State obviously knows that the two sites are more than 60 miles apart. It seems an odd decision. What savings does he expect which could not have been achieved by separate and independent organisations with their own boards of governors?

To avoid doubt such as lingers in many people's minds, can the right hon. and learned Gentleman rule out the suggestion that the announcement is a preliminary to closing one of the colleges by the back door? What changes in student numbers at the two colleges does he expect during the next year or two?

Will the Secretary of State note that we would have welcomed the decision in principle to set up an overarching body to plan and shape higher education in Scotland? I am aware that Lord Croham's committee is still sitting, but will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give an assurance that Lord Croham and his colleagues have had it drawn to their attention that there is the STEAC recommendation and a substantial body of opinion in Scotland which believes that higher education in Scotland must be seen as a unit so that student numbers and curriculums are planned in an integrated and sensible way?

The Secretary of State said something rather tentatively about one or two important and controversial parts of STEAC. Will he note that I am disappointed that he has not responded to the strong case made by the committee for linking educational opportunity with the level of student grants? He has not apparently learnt from its approach to student numbers to the end of the century, which contrasts sharply with the miserable and inadequate approach which is shown in the Government's Green Paper on higher education.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman said that he welcomed the Government's statement that there would be no closures of colleges of education and that he would like clarification of what is meant by my statement that if over-capacity remains a real problem site closures will become inevitable. What I mean is quite simple. Nobody disputes the fact that there is substantial over-capacity in the college of education system. In all the forecasts about likely student numbers in the foreseeable future, it is clear that substantial over-capacity will remain. There are two ways in which it can be dealt with. The first is to close colleges, and the second is to get rid of surplus accommodation, which is to be found in pretty well all colleges of education.

For the reasons that I have given, I believe that it is preferable to try to retain teacher training at each of the existing sites. That is why I have not announced any college closures, despite that being STEAC's recommendation. It is preferable to retain teacher training on each site, but that will be a responsible use of resources only if it is possible for colleges to dispose of the surplus accommodation which they do not need now and which they will not need in future.

If we have the co-operation of colleges, local authorities and others with an interest in these matters, there is a reasonable prospect of that end being achieved. If it is achieved, there need be no closure now or in the future on any of the sites. If it is not achieved, however, I must be frank with the House and say that college closures will become unavoidable.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the decision about physical education at Jordanhill. I echo his observations about the fine contribution to physical education that that department has made. My announcement does not reflect in any way on the quality of the work done there. As the hon. Gentleman said, there is agreement that it is necessary to integrate male and female students on a single site.

Dunfermline college is purpose-built for physical education. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the educational arguments which were put to me, and which I have accepted, pointed overwhelmingly to Dunfermline being the site for physical education. By concentrating all physical education students on that site, it is possible substantially to reduce the present under-use of capacity at Dunfermline. As to the implications for the staff at Jordanhill college, we will be discussing this with governors to ensure that there is the minimum disruption in regard to its prospects.

On the question of the merger of Dundee and Aberdeen, I have said to the hon. Gentleman that there were educational reasons, to which STEAC referred, why the number at each of these colleges was approaching a level, or in some cases was at a level, where it was not possible to give the diversity of training and experience that was educationally preferable. For this reason primarily, it is thought desirable to merge the two colleges so that a rationalisation of courses can be attained.

The hon. Gentleman said that he was concerned that this could be closure by the back door. May I say what I said a few moments ago: if we can get rid of the unnecessary surplus accommodation in the colleges of education of Scotland, it will not be the Government's intention to cease teacher training at any of the present sites, and that includes Dundee and Aberdeen.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman expressed his view that the Opposition were in principle in favour of an overarching body responsible for the planning of higher education in Scotland. In the Government's view, it is unwise to come to a conclusion on this matter until we are able to come to a conclusion on the question of resources. The question whether responsibility for resources should lie with one Department or another is crucial to whether an overarching planning body would be advisory or executive —or, indeed, desirable at all. It therefore seems sensible to decide on these matters when the related questions can also be resolved.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I give my right hon. and learned Friend a very warm welcome for his statement. Everyone in south-west Scotland, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), and particularly the staff of Craigie college, will be delighted that the college is to remain open and that the close relationship in teaching practice will continue in south-west Scotland.

Is my right hon. Friend aware that the amalgamation of PE teaching at Dunfermline will ensure an ideal centre of teaching excellence? May I expect that PE standards in Scotland, in both quality and facilities, will improve?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for his welcome to the proposals.

Craigie has been successful in finding alternative use for much of its surplus accommodation. There is still some surplus capacity, but much is utilised by Ayr technical college. As a consequence, Craigie now has the lowest unit costs of all the colleges in Scotland. One therefore very much hopes not only that Craigie will be able to dispose of any remaining surplus capacity, but that its achievements will be able to be emulated in this respect by other colleges with still greater amounts of surplus accommodation. I have to emphasise that there can be no guarantee for any individual college in Scotland if we are unable to get the overall reduction in surplus capacity that any Government, I believe, would conclude was necessary at present.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Is the Secretary of State aware that, like the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), we very much welcome the decision to keep open the existing colleges? Is he aware that the merging of the organising of the colleges seems in contradiction to the concept of specialist institutions, which he himself warmly commended? In this regard, can he explain the remarkable sentence:

> "I accept that recommendation in principle, while not ruling out entirely the possibility of some other arrangement if circumstances appeared to warrant it."?

That seems to lack the smack of fervour.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his welcome for the Government's decision. I understand that his view is not necessarily shared by all his Liberal colleagues. I understand that the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) indicated that he would wish to see the majority of the colleges retained, thereby implying that he wished to see others closed. I am not certain which view we should assume to be the official view of the Liberal party.

With regard to the hon. Gentleman's other question, we have accepted the conclusion of STEAC. It seems sensible to retain a separate college of education structure, but this matter deserves continuous consideration. We know that elsewhere in the United Kingdom teacher training occasionally has been attached to other education establishments. There are arguments for and against, which STEAC considered. Therefore, my comment was to indicate that I did not wish to rule out the possibility that at some future date consideration might be given to that matter. However, there is at present no proposal to go in that direction.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I accept the premise of the STEAC report that there needs to be rationalisation in teacher training, but is my right hon. Friend aware that there will be real regret in the west of Scotland at the closure of the Scottish school of physical education at Jordanhill college, which has a long and distinguished history? Can he confirm that he was obliged to make the decision to close the Scottish school of physical education because of the European directive that prohibited single sex physical education?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct. The European directive indeed required this, although I am bound to say that the Government believe that there are also sound educational reasons why a development of this kind is highly desirable.

Mr. David Lambie (Cunninghame, South): I congratulate the right hon. and learned Gentleman on recognising the need to maintain a fairly wide geographical spread and to maintain Craigie college of education as a centre of higher education for south-west Scotland. This is the third successful campaign in which I have taken part with the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger) to safeguard the future of Craigie college. In view of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's answer to the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), will he now give a guarantee that the decision on Craigie will not be reviewed next year, and that the decision announced today by the Government will be the final one on Craigie, so giving the right hon. Gentleman and myself a rest for the remainder of our parliamentary lives?

Mr. Rifkind: I freely acknowledge that, when the hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend combine forces, that is a pretty formidable consideration that I have to bear in mind.

As to the hon. Gentleman's question, in all seriousness, I have to emphasise that I very much wish to retain teacher training at all the existing locations, including Craigie, but this will be possible only if it is shown in the next year that we can dispose of the surplus accommodation in the system. Everybody acknowledges that there is substantial surplus in the system. It has to be disposed of. I hope to be able to do that and avoid the closure of teacher training establishments in any location in Scotland, although I cannot guarantee that that will be possible. That depends not only on the action of the Government, but on the willing co-operation of local authorities, because in some cases change of use and planning permission may be necessary. It depends on the co-operation of the colleges themselves and on finding acceptable uses for the surplus accommodation in each of the localities.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the retention of all the colleges of education in Scotland. With the elephantine memory that I have of this issue, may I say that I remember that we have a much better record than others for keeping colleges open?

One thing that has always bothered me is the long-term planning of numbers in colleges of education. I am pretty sure that a more efficient system could be used.

I notice that in his statement my right hon. and learned Friend said that he wished to see the colleges revert to their vocational character. Will he consider Jordanhill college particularly, which has a poor level of morale at present and has rather lost its way as a college? Will he pay special attention to reintroducing that vocational character to Jordanhill?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for her comments. STEAC emphasised that the vocational character of the college of education was an important characteristic that ought to be preserved. I am happy to endorse that.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall endeavour to call all those Members who wish to speak, but I remind the House that we have a heavy day in front of us, and I would be grateful for brief questions.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): How long will the council continue in existence? The proposal to merge Moray House and Dunfermline college will be greeted with deep dismay at the college in Cramond. Can the Secretary of State give an assurance that the fine work carried out by the college in education and training for the tourist industry will not be harmed in any way by such a merger?

Mr. Rifkind: The STEAC will continue for at least a year, as I said. I believe that my statement about the merger of Dunfermline and Moray House will be warmly welcomed because it involves a substantial additional responsibility for Dunfermline, as it is to become the sole centre for physical education training in Scotland. In addition, the proposed merger with Moray House will have important educational benefits. It is important that teacher trainees in physical education should have greater contact with other teacher trainees and be able to use the facilities of Moray House. That greater link between the two colleges will be to the benefit of trainees and staff at both colleges.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many people regard this as a wise and imaginative statement which has something of what might be called "Malcolm's Magic"? In particular, is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that it will be regarded as better educationally, financially and geographically than what was first proposed? Given the opportunities that my right hon. and learned Friend has provided for these colleges to use available resources to do wider and different things within those establishments, can he establish a conference of the colleges concerned and other educational bodies, which together can think of useful schemes to bring this about successfully?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for that welcome. I emphasise that it is important for the colleges to appreciate that the alternative accommodation which they are seeking to dispose of need not be used only for educational purposes. If there are alternative educational purposes, there is no objection to that. The important thing is to ensure the disposal of that surplus accommodation. Whether it is used for educational, residential or other purposes is a matter to which the colleges can give equal consideration. The important thing is to ensure that we have a healthy use of the available resources. It cannot be healthy for half empty buildings to continue being financed from available resources. That is not in the educational interest, or in that of colleges.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I welcome the Secretary of State's announcement that he has recognised the geographical principle that we need a spread of education teaching opportunities. Will he also recognise that the statement is a continuation of 10 years of uncertainty for the colleges and amounts to a stay of execution until after the next general election? In the context of the Dundee and Aberdeen colleges, will the Secretary of State say what rationalisation will take place, what further reductions in student numbers there will be on each site, and what effect that will have on staff? I register my disappointment and that of my party at the Secretary of State's failure to grasp the opportunity given by STEAC for an overarching body.

Mr. Rifkind: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman refers to my announcement as a stay of execution for Dundee. He appears to believe that it is impossible to dispose of surplus accommodation in Dundee. If that is possible, it is not a stay of execution, but a reprieve, because it means that teacher training will be able to continue on a permanent basis at Dundee.

The hon. Gentleman knows that Dundee college has about one fifth of the students that it needs to utilise its full capacity. The hon. Gentleman cannot be happy that Dundee college is about 80 per cent. unused. He knows the great difficulty that there has been in finding any alternative educational use for that building that would utilise the spare capacity. If the hon. Gentleman and others with an interest in this matter in Dundee, including the local authority and the college, got together and, in co-operation with the Scottish Office, ensured the disposal of the surplus accommodation, allowing teacher training to continue in Dundee with the accommodation that is really needed, teacher training would continue on a permanent basis.

Mr. John Corrie (Cunninghame, North): I support what the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) said. I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on the skilful way in which he has reached his decision. I thank him on behalf of the people of Ayrshire and the south-west of Scotland for keeping Craigie college going. Is it not frightfully important that students go from rural areas to a rural environment college and return to their areas so that there is good liaison between teachers and pupils?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, that is a desirable objective, and I bore in mind the fact that in England and Wales there is substantial geographical diversity, which is easier in those two countries because there are relatively few separate colleges of further education and teacher training tends to be linked to other educational training establishments. We have separate colleges of education, which were built larger than is needed in modern circumstances. That is why we have the problem that we are now seeking to resolve.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): The Opposition were not surprised that the Secretary of State came to this conclusion, as it is the argument that we have been making since the debate on the Education (Scotland) Act 1981. More recently, in March of this year, my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) had an Adjournment debate on this subject. There is a need for a geographical spread of the colleges. There is a need to see what use can be made of spare capacity. For those reasons, we are not surprised that the Secretary of State has come to this conclusion.

It makes nonsense to have two colleges that are 64 miles apart sharing one governing body. Where will it meet? Will it be offshore, in Montrose, Johnshaven, or Stonehaven? It must lead to concern, and I am sure that if the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) catches your eye, Mr. Speaker, he will make the same point. There must be pressure on these colleges of education. We do not regard them as sites. They are colleges with people — teachers, staff and students. There must be some concern about the statement and its effect on Aberdeen and Dundee.

Mr. Rifkind: I hope that there will continue to be teachers, pupils and staff in both cities for the foreseeable future. While the hon. Gentleman is correct to say that he and his hon. Friends have continually said that they are against college closures, they have not demonstrated their commitment to seeking the disposal of surplus accommodation. That is a crucial part of the strategy.

I emphasise that it is not sufficient simply to say that we must not close colleges. At the moment there are 5,000 teacher trainees in Scotland. It is expected that there will be a maximum of 7,500 in years to come. The college capacity is about 10,000. Unless we can bridge the gap between what is needed and what is not, it is inevitable that some colleges will close. We all wish to avoid that, and we can do so if we have maximum co-operation.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): The Secretary of State has been evasive about a number of key issues facing tertiary education in Scotland. Why did he take the political decision to smash the physical education facilities at Jordanhill, which must surely override some of the economic, social and geographical factors involved?

Mr. Rifkind: That is an extraordinary and absurd remark. Far from it being a political decision, I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are required by the European directive to eliminate single sex education in physical education. The numbers involved could not possibly justify having male and female students at both Jordanhill and Dunfermline, and in Dunfermline we have the only purpose-built college of physical education in Scotland. If the hon. Gentleman cannot see the logic in that, nothing that I say will convince him.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I welcome the tribute that the Secretary of State has paid to Jordanhill. Can he be a little more explanatory? When he speaks about the minimal disruption that he hopes will follow consultation — [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins)?"] My right hon. Friend is in hospital recovering from an operation. Has the Secretary of State any ideas on whether that minimal disruption following consultation with the governors will involve lay offs and transfers?

Mr. Rifkind: It would be wrong for me to speculate on that matter before we discuss it with the governors. Clearly the transfer of a significant number of students from Jordanhill to Dunfermline college will involve some opportunities for staff. However, the conclusion on that must await detailed discussions, and I do not want to give a misleading answer that might not be borne out by events.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): Will the Secretary of State be more forthcoming about the inquiry that he hopes to institute in conjunction with the UGC about the education department at Stirling university, bearing in mind the need for a geographical spread of colleges and facilities in Scotland? Central region lost Callander Park after the college had done everything that the Secretary of State is now recommending to other colleges, namely, to rent out all available surplus accommodation within its campus. At the end of the day the college was still closed. Can the Secretary of State assure us, therefore, that there will be a full and fair review in conjunction with the UGC, unlike some of the reviews that have been carried out recently? Will he also make it clear that in the recent past other Ministers in his Department have closed colleges even though those colleges had done everything they could to rid the Scottish taxpayer of the burden of the cost of the surplus accommodation?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman will know that responsibility for universities lies not with me but with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. The Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council recommended a review of the position at Stirling university with regard to teacher training. In conjunction with my right hon. Friend, I have accepted that recommendation. We must await the outcome of that review.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): May I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the honour that you keep bestowing on me of giving me the last word on these occasions?

I hope that I am in order in adding my thanks to the Secretary of State for Scotland for accepting the powerful educational, geographical and economic argument that was put on behalf of Craigie college, not just by my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) and by the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), but by all people in the south-west of Scotland. It is only marred a little by the year's review, which is perhaps piling up work for my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar).

Can the Secretary of State assure us, because worry arises from one or two things that he has repeated in his statement, that colleges like Craigie, which are getting rid of surplus accommodation or are making effective use of it, will not be penalised because big colleges like Moray House and Jordanhill do not over the next year get rid of surplus accommodation, as the Secretary of State recommends? Can he make it clear that he will put pressure on colleges that have surplus accommodation either to use it effectively or to dispose of it so that colleges that do as he asks will not suffer?

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to have the last word. I am overwhelmed by the combined congratulations of the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) and the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). It is an experience with which I am not familiar and I suspect that it will not often be repeated.

I accept their requirement to put maximum pressure on all colleges of education that have surplus capacity. I have given no assurances to any college as to its long-term future if surplus capacity is not removed. If it is possible to speak on behalf of both sides of the House, it is highly desirable for all colleges, including the larger ones, to get rid of surplus accommodation. They will do a service not only to themselves but to the interests of teacher training in Scotland as a whole.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I may have the last word on the last question. I say to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) that if he cannot be first he might as well be last.

Mr. Foulkes: And the last shall be first.

Mr. Speaker: Even that.

Mr. Speaker: In addition to the amendments set out in my provisional selection, which has already been circulated, I am selecting amendment No. 19, standing in the name of the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen). That amendment is to be found on page 2083 of the amendment paper and it will be taken immediately after Government amendment No. 102 and its related amendments.

New Clause 18

BROADCASTING: ADDITIONAL PAYMENTS BY PROGRAMME CONTRACTORS

.—(1) The Broadcasting Act 1981 shall have effect with respect to additional payments payable by programme contractors under that Act subject to the amendment made by Part I of Schedule (Broadcasting: additional payments by programme contractors) to this Act.

(2) The transitional provisions made by Part II of that Schedule shall have effect.

(3) This section shall be deemed to have come into force on 1st April 1986.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 29 and 30.

4.54 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I feel somewhat honoured to move a new clause to the Finance Bill which relates directly to the affairs of the Home Department, but that is the position I am in today.

New clause 18 and amendments Nos. 29 and 30 seek to implement proposals relating to the scheme of additional payments in the Broadcasting Act 1981, commonly known as the ITV levy. The Government's proposals for changing the structure of the levy were announced earlier this year by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

When the levy was first introduced in 1964, it was based on ITV contractors' revenue. The revenue-based levy proved, however, to be a rather blunt instrument and it was replaced in 1974 by a 66·7 per cent. levy on profits from the provision of programmes within the United Kingdom. Subject to some minor modifications, the arrangements which were introduced then are those which now remain on the statute book. The problem with a profits levy with a rate as high as 66·7 per cent. is, however, that, taken together with corporation tax, it imposes a very high marginal tax rate on the ITV companies. While the Act contains safeguards against excessive expenditure, Ministers have for some time been concerned that the high marginal rate might act as a disincentive to cost efficiency, and this view has been reinforced more recently by the Peacock committee. Accordingly, a working group of officials from the Home Office, Treasury and IBA was set up in 1984 to look at the structure of the levy, and in particular at ways in which the marginal rate might be reduced.

The working group reported to Ministers in May 1985. Coincidentally, the Committee of Public Accounts also examined the levy in 1985. In the light of the Committee's report, which was published last autumn, and that of the working group, we decided that implementation of the working group's central recommendation would be a worthwhile exercise. Accordingly, the amendments to which I am speaking seek to reduce the standard rate of levy from 66·7 per cent. to 45 per cent., while removing the current exemption from levy of overseas profits and imposing on them a levy of 22·5 per cent. The reduction in the standard rate of levy will provide a worthwhile reduction in the marginal tax rate which should provide the companies with an increased incentive to efficiency.

We are well aware of the need to preserve an incentive for the companies to export programmes, and that is why we have set the second rate of levy at 22·5 per cent., exactly half the standard rate. There is no particular magic in this ratio between the two rates and we shall want to monitor the position carefully over the next year or so. Under the new provisions, as now, rates of levy can be changed by order subject to the approval of both Houses of Parliament, and if there are any unforeseen results we shall want to consider whether the balance between the two rates might be adjusted. The rates currently in the new schedule have been set so as to secure broadly that there is the same revenue to the Exchequer.

We have also made it clear that we intend to implement some of the working group's minor recommendations and —apart from the reduction of the ILR levy rate, the radio provision, to zero, which was achieved by a statutory instrument which took effect on 1 April—this too is done by the amendments before us. The cash value of the "free slice" of non-leviable profits is increased from £650,000 to £800,000, to take account of inflation since it was last altered in 1982. Any proportion of the free slice which remains after it has been set against profits in the main category may be transferred to the second category of leviable profits. There are provisions dealing with loss relief, and the working group's recommendations on the provisions of the existing legislation which deal with refunds from the Consolidated Fund of levy overpayments, and with excessive expenditure, are also implemented in these provisions.

It may be of assistance if I now give a brief explanation of the new provisions dealing with the levy. New clause 18 does no more than give effect to the new schedule, and provides for the arrangements to take effect from 1 April, as announced by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 27 March. Paragraph 1 of the new schedule provides for leviable profits to be divided into "first category profits" which, broadly speaking, will be profits from the provision of programmes for broadcasting on ITV or the fourth channel, and "second category profits" which will be profits from the provision of programmes elsewhere in the United Kingdom and abroad. The new rates of levy and the new value of the free slice are set out in paragraph 1, which also makes a number of minor consequential amendments to section 32 of the 1981 Act.

Paragraph 2 implements the working group's recommendation that it should be possible for refunds of overpayments of levy to be made during the accounting period in which the overpayments were made. Paragraph 3 makes two sets of changes to section 35 of the 1981 Act, which contains the Home Secretary's power to prescribe —subject to the approval of Parliament—a company's minimum levy liability in the case of excessive expenditure.

The first change is to implement the working group's recommendation that it should be possible for an order under section 35 to be made for a limited period after the end of the accounting period to which it relates; the time limit is now to be six months from the date on which the contractor submits his audited accounts to the IBA.

The second set of changes is designed to deter second category levy avoidance by providing the Home Secretary with the power — subject again to the approval of Parliament — to make a section 35 order where a contractor's second category levy payments are deficient as a result of transfer pricing. I should stress that this is a weapon very much of last resort against levy avoidance of a kind which I hope will not occur. It is to be seen as a deterrent rather than a provision of normal use. I do not believe that it has been used to date.

Paragraph 4 contains the necessary detailed definitional changes consequent on the division of the levy into two parts. It also removes the current exemption for profits arising outside the United Kingdom, and implements— although these provisions are not backdated before 1 April —the working group's recommendations on loss relief. The definitions of first and second category profits are mutually exclusive, and the first category is defined rather more narrowly than the existing category of leviable profits since it will, in future, consist only of profits from the provision of programmes for broadcasting on ITV and the fourth channel.

Profits from the sale of publications such as the "TV Times" will, however, continue to come within first category profits. "Second category profits" are defined in such a way as to ensure profits from the sale of formats —the ideas behind a television programme, a kind of synopsis on which they are able to sell programmes abroad —are treated in the same way as profits from the sale of programmes. The profits of certain related companies will be relevant for the calculation of a company's second category levy liability. This is because programme sales are frequently handled not by the contractor himself but by a connected company.

Under the loss relief system in the new paragraph 2C of schedule 4 to the 1981 Act, companies may carry forward losses in either category provided they have first set them against any profits in the other category for the accounting period in question. Losses may not, however, be carried between one contract period and another.

Paragraphs 5, 6 and 7 make consequential amendments to provisions in the current legislation. Paragraph 8 redefines "subsidiary" for the purpose of the levy provisions, and defines the connection which will be sufficient to bring a related company's profits into the calculation of second category profits. A subsidiary of a contractor is defined as a company in which the contractor has 10 per cent. of the shares or the voting power; and a "connected person" consists of a subsidiary of an ITV contractor; an investor who holds 10 per cent. of the contractor's shares or voting power; and a subsidiary of an investor of this kind. Companies engaged in programme distribution by wireless telegraphy or cable do not, however, fall within this definition. Paragraph 8 also contains an apportionment rule where a single person falls into more than one category of programme contractor.

Paragraphs 9 and 10 contain transitional provisions dealing with existing contracts between the IBA and programme contractors, and with profits or losses occurring in accounting periods which straddle the change in levy arrangements.

Finally, amendment No. 30 consists of consequential repeals to the existing legislation on the levy.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): My hon. Friend referred to the report of the Public Accounts Committee. I have taken a particular interest in the subject since it originally came before the Committee. This is the second time that it has come before the Committee.

I welcome the new clause. I shall cite one figure from the report of the Comptroller and Auditor General entitled "Independent Broadcasting Authority: Additional Payments by Programme Contractors" dated 29 April 1985. Appendix 1 referred to the year 1982-83 and said that Thames, which is not a small station by any yardstick, managed to have a levy payment of absolutely nil. The report showed that Central, which serves a marginal part of my constituency—again, it is hardly a minor contractor — paid £211,000. That showed the Public Accounts Committee that the machinery available — there is nothing wrong with that necessarily — was used to ensure that the Revenue received little benefit from the levy.

I think that my hon. Friend is right to have a substantial differential between the export levy and the domestic levy. I am told that for the first five months of the current year revenue is up 22 per cent. The figure for June is extraordinary. Revenue is up 28 per cent. Given that the Peacock committee never addressed the problem of the inflationary increases in television advertising rates, compared with the retail price index, my hon. Friend must recognise that careful monitoring of work is required. It is a buoyant area of revenue. If my hon. Friend is prompted, as a result of the Peacock committee, to extend the life of the existing contractors, he must consider forecasts of revenue and watch them carefully. I shall be urging my colleagues on the Public Accounts Committee to review the position at a convenient date. If there is to be an extension of the existing licences, a further review will be necessary.

I have been concerned with the work of the British Overseas Trade Board. If my hon. Friend is to garner revenue from the export activities of our contractors—may they continue to be highly successful—I hope that a proportion of that revenue will go to the BOTB, because it has had a cutback. The board does major work in the interests of United Kingdom exports.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I congratulate my hon. Friend on keeping a straight face when he introduced the new clause. Paragraph 10(2), page 2050, of the extraordinary document entitled "Consideration of Bill" shows X over X plus Y. At that stage, X is obviously a good person. The subparagraph continues:

"the amount payable by him on the assumption that that section was in force throughout the accounting period and that both his first category profits for that period and his second category profits for that period were reduced by multiplying them by $\frac{Y}{X + Y}$ where (taking any odd four days or more as a week)".

My hon. Friend and I were at school together. How does one take any odd four days or more as a week? Enlightenment follows:

"X is the number of weeks in the accounting period falling before 1st April 1986"— that is a significant date in the new clause—

"and Y is the number of weeks in the accounting period falling after 31st March . . . For the purposes of the application of paragraph 2C of Schedule 4 to the Act of 1981 in relation to losses incurred by the programme contractor during the accounting period, those losses shall be reduced by multiplying them by"—

wait for it—

"$\frac{Y}{X + Y}$ where X and Y have the same meaning as in sub-paragraph (2) above."

With all respect to my hon. Friend and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, words fail me. It is a seven-page new clause. How on earth is it possible to ask Parliament to pass a new clause that is absolute gibberish, and require the courts to enforce it? I suggest strongly to my hon. Friend, to whom I am devoted, that it is absolute nonsense and completely inexplicable.

Mr. Michael Morris rose——

Mr. Rhodes James: Does my hon. Friend wish to explain it? Does he know whether it is X or Y?

Mr. Morris: The Public Accounts Committee looked into this matter in considerable depth. I urge my hon. Friend to read the report; he might be enlightened.

Mr. Rhodes James: I shall be grateful for any enlightenment, but this is to be an Act of Parliament. I feel strongly that Acts of Parliament should be written in the English language. The new clause is not. If my hon. Friend knows what X or Y is, that is fine. However, Parliament should not willingly or silently allow new clauses like this to pass without comment.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Like the Minister, I am a rare intruder into debates on the Finance Bill. I spend most of my time very much backstage in the quieter, calmer waters of home affairs. It is a rare treat to be able to look at this new clause and new schedule.

I deeply sympathise with the elegant remarks of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James). The timing of the debate is interesting. It enables us, however briefly, to comb through the rubble of what is left of the Government's broadcasting policy after the botch-up over community radio and the nonsense of the Peacock committee report.

It is as well to remind ourselves of the purpose of the levy. It is, as Peacock noted in a rare, clarifying comment in paragraph 68,

"to provide the public with an appropriate share in the monopoly exploitation of a profitable public asset"— and then, in case we had not got the point, the words

"(ie the airwaves)"

were added in brackets. We understand the arguments behind the changes in loss relief, overpayments and minimum levy liability. However, I ask the Minister to confirm—and to that extent to repeat and refresh—the Government's continued support for the idea of the levy, in the terms set out in the Peacock report. Will he assure the House that whatever the changes in the levels of levy and the mechanisms by which it is calculated, it remains the Government's policy to require commercial television companies to continue to give back to the public purse a share of the profits made from their monopoly position?

The levy is important on those grounds, helping—as I believe it does—to sustain our complementary rather than directly competitive system of public service broadcasting through the BBC and the commercial sector. It is not clear whether the levy charges—a cut of 21·7 per cent. in the main rate, a rise of £150,000 in the free slice and a rate of 22·5 per cent. on the second category of profits that are earned overseas—will mean more or less revenue for the public purse.

I believe that the Minister said that the revenue effects would be broadly the same as the present position and that his estimate was that the levy changes may mean that more money will be left to the contractors. I do not necessarily object to that. However, if that is the case, what assurances have the IBA and the programme contractors been able to offer about how much of that windfall, if it turns out to be a windfall, will find its way back into programmes? That is what it should all be about: trying to ensure that the range, variety and quality of programmes improve and expand.

That is especially important for our regional commercial television contractors. There is an increasing and, in my view, a proper demand within the regions for more bespoke, regionally made programmes which better reflect the diversity and difference of interests within our regions. I am a strong supporter of that demand and in my area I was glad that when the last franchise was awarded Central Independent Television was required to treat the east midlands as a centre in its own right rather than simply as a place at the end of the motorways from Birmingham.

Of course, regional programme makers also compete for networking, and perhaps the latest and most brilliantly successful example—which happens to be from Central Independent Television — is "Spitting Image", which lately swept the nation with its puzzling invitation to us all to hold a chicken in the air.

5.15 pm

May I ask the Minister whether decisions have yet been taken on the next round of franchises? There are anxieties among the franchise holders over reported Government plans to try to extend the present franchises for an extra two years, as the Government ponder the ponderous Peacock proposals. Is the Minister able to announce any decisions today, or is he able to give an undertaking about when a statement will be made? Will he assure the House that any such statement on franchises will be made on the Floor of the House? The Opposition would not be in favour of fiddling the franchises, although there are some changes in their allocation and perhaps in their duration which we would think sensible.

I welcome the inclusion in the new schedule of advertising receipts and income from direct broadcasting by satellite contractors. Again, this is on all fours with the principle of paying the public for the exploitation of public property.

Finally, I should like to express the hope that these levy changes will both enable and encourage programme makers and commercial contractors to develop and produce a range of programmes that can help us in the years ahead to sustain our claim to have one of the finest television services in the world. That position was hard won by the BBC and the commercial companies, and it will only be with care, dedication and innovation that that reputation will be sustained.

Mr. Giles Shaw: With the leave of the House, may I comment on the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris). I thank him for the welcome that he gave these proposals. He is well versed in the mechanics of the levy system and also, through his assiduity as a member of the Public Accounts Committee, in the examination of the existing levy. I have to remind him that the vagaries of advertising revenue sometimes surprise all of us.

My hon. Friend will recall that only about nine or 12 months ago there was a major downturn in advertising receipts for the television companies. Now, as he rightly pointed out, they are fairly buoyant. It would be difficult for us to take into account a more flexible assessment of the levy system if we were to look merely at one year's performance compared with another. My hon. Friend will be aware that with this instrument, which is variable by order, there is a mechanism whereby adjustments can be made to suit what looks like a trend, if that trend requires changes to be made.

I noted my hon. Friend's welcome of the differential between the home levy base and the overseas levy base. When companies come to terms with the change, they will find that it is not inimical to development. We hope that it will contribute to the thrust of ensuring that cost pressures of one kind or another prevail within an industry which, at the moment, lacks competitive pressure. I shall turn to that point when I deal with the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett).

I understand the anxiety of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) about the algebraic formula in the amendment. With his profundity he will recognise that this system lends itself to a form of expression which he and I find pretty miserable. However, we shall have to settle our differences by saying that this is merely corroborative detail and that it adds artistic verisimilitude to an otherwise bald and unconvincing narrative.

I am able to give the hon. Member for Erdington the assurance that he sought. No decision has been taken on franchises and no decision will be taken for some time. However, in my right hon. Friend's initial response to the Peacock recommendations he told the IBA that there must be room for franchises to be looked at, should the Government subsequently decide that changes are required.

Therefore, there will be discussions to see that the current round would not be started without some assessment being made of the position. I think that the hon. Gentleman will recognise also that significant changes are likely to involve amendment to the current statutory framework which will probably not happen soon.

Monopoly characteristics lie behind the levy system which is designed to ensure, to some extent, on behalf of the consumer and the taxpayer, that where local monopolies granted for television advertising are in the hands of the programme contractors, there will be a mechanism to cream off surplus profit. How such profits are spent is a matter for the contracting companies only and it is not for the Government to determine whether they should all go into programme production, or into other forms of expenditure.

However, over the considerable period of time that the levy system has been operating, the quality of programming has improved, which shows that the companies are keen to compete on the basis of quality as well as upon audience numbers.

The House will be kept informed of any major changes in Government policy on ITV, much of which would relate to legislation which hon. Members would have an opportunity of shaping. This new clause appears to command reasonable support, and I therefore commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

"new statutory provisions" means the provisions of the Broadcasting Act 1981 as amended by this Act; and "existing statutory provisions" means the provisions of that Act as they had effect immediately before the passing of this Act.

(2) Any contract between the Authority and a programme contractor which is in force immediately before the passing of this Act shall, until it is varied or superseded by a further contract between them or expires or is otherwise terminated (whichever first occurs) be deemed to be modified by virtue of this Schedule so as—

(a) to substitute provisions in conformity with the new statutory provisions for so much of the contract as is in accordance with the existing statutory provisions and is not in conformity with the new statutory provisions, and

(b) to incorporate in the contract such additional provisions as a contract between the Authority and a programme contractor is required to include in accordance with new statutory provisions; and (subject to paragraph 4 of Schedule 4 to this Act of 1981) any provisions of the contract which provide for arbitration as to any matters contained in the contract in accordance with the existing statutory provisions shall be construed as making the like provision for arbitration in relation to matters deemed to be included in the contract by virtue of this sub-paragraph.

(3) Where is appears to the Authority that the new statutory provisions call for the inclusion of additional terms in any such contract, but do not afford sufficient particulars of what those terms should be, the Authority may, after consulting the programme contractor, decide what those terms are to be.

(4) This paragraph shall not be taken to have effect in relation any contract entered into by a programme contractor and any person other than the Authority before the passing of this Act.

(b) section 83(1A) or (2) above, shall be disregarded in construing section 86(4) and (5) above.

(2) Subsection (3) below applies where the chargeable securities mentioned in section 86(1) above are constituted by or transferable by means of an inland bearer instrument, within the meaning of the heading "Bearer Instrument" in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891, which—

(a) in subsection (2) the words from "unless" to the end;

(b) subsections (4), (5) and (8).'.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government new clauses 27 to 30.

New clause 32—Acquisition of target company's share capital—

'(1) Stamp duty under the heading "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891 shall not be chargeable for an instrument transferring shares in one company (the target company) to another company (the acquiring company) if the conditions mentioned in subsection (3) below are fulfilled.

(2) An instrument on which stamp duty is not chargeable by virtue only of subsection (1) above shall not be taken to be duly stamped unless it is stamped with the duty to which it would be liable but for that subsection or it has, in accordance with section 12 of the Stamp Act 1891, been stamped with a particular stamp denoting that it is not chargeable with any duty.

(3) The conditions are that—

(a) the registered office of the acquiring company is in the United Kingdom,

(b) the transfer forms part of an arrangement by which the acquiring company acquires the whole of the issued share capital of the target company,

(c) the acquisition is effected for bona fide commercial reasons and does not form part of a scheme or arrangement of which the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, is avoidance of liability to stamp duty, stamp duty reserve tax, income tax, corporation tax or capital gains tax,

(d) the consideration for the acquisition consists only of the issue of shares in the acquiring company to the shareholders of the target company,

(e) after the acquisition has been made, each person who immediately before it was made was a shareholder of the target company is a shareholder of the acquiring company,

(f) after the acquisition has been made, the shares in the acquiring company are of the same classes as were the shares in the target company immediately before the acquisition was made,

(g) after the acquisition has been made, the number of shares of any particular class in the acquiring company bears to all the shares in that company the same proportion as the number of shares of that class in the target company bore to all the shares in that company immediately before the acquisition was made, and

(h) after the acquisition has been made, the proportion of shares of any particular class in the acquiring company held by any particular shareholder is the same as the proportion of shares of that class in the target company held by him immediately before the acquisition was made.

(4) In this section references to shares and to share capital include references to stock.

(5) This section applies to any instrument executed on or after 1st August 1986.".

Government amendments Nos. 179 to 182 and 189.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): The new clauses are designed to ensure that where a transaction is exempt from stamp duty it is also exempt from stamp duty reserve tax. Perhaps the Minister will confirm that.

The new clauses and amendments do nothing more than rectify obvious omissions from the original provisions. However, the new clauses are among over 40 new clauses and amendments to the part of the Finance Bill that deals with stamp duty. In debating this part of the Finance Bill in Committee we also dealt with many new clauses and amendments to the Government's original proposals. This is the Government's third or fourth attempt to set out their objectives in changing stamp duty and stamp duty reserve tax.

It is a disgrace that the Bill has been so badly drafted. The Minister seems to have some kind of parliamentary record for the number of new clauses and amendments to Bills, or to parts of Bills, for which he has been responsible. As one example of this I divert temporarily to cite the Building Societies Bill. The Minister must have the all-time record for the number of times that he changes his mind —or his officials change their minds—and drafts and redrafts to fill up holes, add explanations and deal with omissions from the various Bills for which he has been responsible.

In the Finance Bill we are deluged with amendments and new clauses from the Minister. It is time that he learnt how to decide what he wants and to get it right in the first place. Legislation as poor as this should not go through the House time after time. There is no guarantee that the Minister has got this particular set of amendments and new clauses right. Perhaps he will comment on what I have said.

5.15 pm

Mr. Rhodes James: Unlike the last new schedule, new clause 32 has the merit of being comprehensible and written in the English language. There are no Xs and Ys. The clause seeks to provide exemption from ad valorem stamp duty for certain types of company reorganisation falling within the scope of the exemption provided by clause 75, but apparently not falling within the terms of the exemption provided.

The Bill provides a much needed reduction from 1 to 0·5 per cent. in the rate of stamp duty on share transfers. The cost of the reduction is covered in part by the withdrawal of exemptions for takeovers, schemes of reconstruction, amalgamation and demergers.

Clause 75 provides for an exemption to continue to be given for schemes of reconstruction where there is no real change of ownership. The exemption is restricted to reconstruction which involves the transfer of "the whole or part of an undertaking"

from one company to another. It is a condition of the exemption that the consideration for the acquisition of the undertaking must consist of, or include, the issue of shares in the acquiring company to all the shareholders of the company whose undertaking is being acquired.

The exemption in clause 75, which I welcome, could apply where the reorganisation involves a transfer of a trading subsidiary from one group member to another, provided the consideration consists of shares and the shares are issued to the shareholders of the target company. They cannot be issued to the target company itself. There is, therefore, no exemption where a group wishes to restructure itself and to put a new holding company on top of the existing group. In this situation the acquiring company would need to issue shares to the target company and not to the shareholders of the target company.

This problem first came to my attention when a company in my constituency tried to make itself more efficient by planning a reorganisation to involve the creation of a new holding company. No change in ownership of the group was involved. Before the Budget introduced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer the reorganisation would have been exempted from stamp duty under the provisions of section 55 of the Finance Act 1927, when Mr. Winston Churchill was Chancellor. The group had obtained the necessary clearances from the Revenue to carry out the proposed reorganisation. The Revenue accepted that the reorganisation was for genuine commercial reasons and that there was no question of tax avoidance.

I am a layman in such matters, although after my experience of the new schedule I may become more interested in them. To me, as a layman, the reorganisation seemed to be precisely what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had in mind when he announced that an exemption was being preserved for reconstructions. However, the case — there are many others — does not fall within the terms of exemption provided by clause 75.

The House may reasonably ask why the group could not modify the reconstruction so as to bring itself within the terms of the exemption provided by clause 75. Transferring a business from the ownership of one corporate organisation to another is not, however, a simple matter. Contracts of employment may well have to be renegotiated with unions and employees. Contracts with customers may also have to be renegotiated. Transferring a business from one company into a group may present accounting problems, because trading entities could be separated from reserves held or liabilities incurred in connection with the business. It can also affect the date on which corporation tax is paid. Where the reorganisation otherwise meets the conditions set out in clause 75, it seems not unreasonable that in those cases there should be a stamp duty exemption.

As I said, a particular constituency case brought this problem to my attention. My new clause 32 would meet a much wider problem, which perhaps was not foreseen when the Finance Bill was originally introduced, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will look benignly on it.

5.30 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) is correct in her interpretation that the exemptions for stamp duty also apply to stamp duty reserve tax. As usual, she has done her homework efficiently and I compliment her on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) has raised a most interesting point in new clause 32. I congratulate him on the way in which he has explained the problem. It is not necessary for me to add to what he said in explanation of his new clause.

Clause 75, which deals with reconstructions, does not take into account the possibility of placing a holding company over the top of an existing group. We think, like my hon. Friend, that that is a legitimate extension of the spirit of clause 75 and that in certain practical cases, rather like the one that he has drawn to our attention, representing a company in his constituency, it is something for which the Bill should cater.

Usually the problem with this sort of proposal is one of drafting, but my hon. Friend shrewdly decided that it would be sensible if he and the company concerned were to contact my officials and those in the Revenue to see whether it could be put into wording which would satisfactorily deal with the problem. I am glad to say that that has been possible.

Therefore, I had to try out my hon. Friend's new clause on three further grounds. First, did it contain any algebra? It passed that test. Secondly, did it contain any reference to 1 April? It passed that test too. Thirdly, did it come up to the literary style that we expect from my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge? Relatively speaking, considering the subject, it probably passes that test, and, therefore, I recommend the House to accept it.

Dr. McDonald: In that case, the hon. Gentleman should ask the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) to write all his clauses and amendments for him.

Mr. Stewart: That is an interesting suggestion, and it enables me to come to the third point with which I want to deal. The hon. Lady complained that there were a considerable number of new clauses and amendments on stamp duty. They represent not only some changes of substance — although relatively small changes of substance, considering the number of amendments to which they have given rise—but show the difficulty of expressing provisions on stamp duty in a simple form which are internally consistent. I defend myself. I am slightly caught between my hon. and elegant Friend from the university, who wants to have everything rewritten in the clearest possible way, and the hon. Lady, who chides me for having these new clauses and amendments on the Amendment Paper.

New clauses 26, 27 and 28 are no more than a slightly tidier rearrangement of provisions which are already in the Bill in clause 87, and that is why one of the amendments omits clause 87. We do our best to try to strike a balance between the conflicting desires of the House. I am sorry that that adds to the material that the hon. Lady, and, I might say, I, have to deal with.

As I said in Committee, I thought that I had drawn the short ministerial straw when I found myself dealing with the stamp duty clauses, and the hon. Lady drew the short Opposition straw in being allocated this wicked subject. I conclude by complimenting her on the way in which she has dealt with these confusing and highly technical matters, not only in Committee, but on Report.

I can plead that, more than most of the measures in the group, these are designed to simplify the Bill and make it easier to understand and use. I hope that in that spirit the hon. Lady will find the group acceptable.

Mr. Rhodes James: With the leave of the House, I should like to express my profound gratitude to my hon. Friend and his officials over this matter. It was a complicated one, which has been satisfactorily resolved, and I and my constituent and many others are grateful.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Clause 67

DEPOSITARY RECEIPTS

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move amendment No. 148, in page 59, line 27, leave out 'registered' and insert 'incorporated'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 205, 206, 150, 207, 151 to 155, 208, 156, 159, 160, 209, 210, 162, 163, 244, 165 to 170, 211 to 214, 184, 215, 186, 216 to 220, 191, 221, 194 to 198, 222 and 223.

Dr. McDonald: Amendments Nos. 148 to 200 correct drafting errors in the stamp duty provisions and clarify the text. However, other amendments are a little more puzzling. Amendments Nos. 205 to 224, which were tabled on 10 July, deal with securities issued or sold partly paid.

It appears from inquiries made that those amendments all concern the 1·5 per cent. stamp duty charge imposed when securities are converted into depositary receipts—ADRs — or are placed in a clearing system. The amendments are designed to ensure that if the securities are paid for by instalmnts, the 1·5 per cent. duty is also paid in instalments, or, at least, that is the description that I obtained when I made inquiries about the meaning of the amendments. However, neither I, nor any tax experts whom I consulted, can understand how the amendments achieve the result which was explained to me and to others by the Inland Revenue from whom I made inquiries.

In commenting on this group of amendments, I hope that the Minister will explain how exactly they achieve the purpose that they are alleged to achieve by the Inland Revenue. It is completely and utterly mystifying to me and to those whom I have consulted. It may all be clear to the Minister. I hope that it is. If so, perhaps he will tell us. If it is not, I suggest that he is suffering from enormous difficulties because, unlike the procedure on other Bills, he will not be able to add another 200 or so amendments in the other place to be considered at some future date here. Therefore, I hope that the hon. Gentleman has an adequate and clear explanation of how this group of amendments achieves the purpose which, according to the Inland Revenue, it is supposed to have.

It may be that the amendments do not have that purpose at all, but, if so, what purpose do they have? I regret to say that the amendments do not seem to clarify the situation, but rather muddy the waters still further. No doubt that will cause great headaches for those outside when they seek to apply them to their financial dealings.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) gives me an invitation which I cannot resist, which is to comment at greater length on those amendments that deal with payment by instalment. I shall discuss the relevant amendments which, as the hon. Lady said, are most of the amendments Nos. 205 to 224. I shall begin with amendments Nos. 205, 206, and 207.

When shares are sold and the price is payable by instalment, the vendor may be unwilling to transfer the share certificates to the purchaser until the final instalment payment has been made. In those circumstances, a third party, normally a custodian bank, will hold the shares until the purchase price is fully paid and then provide the purchaser with an interim or substitute certificate which can be bought and sold on the stock exchange in the normal way.

The possibility of a double charge in this case arises because the terms of the instalment arrangement involve the deposit with a depositary bank of different documents of title at different times. When the interim certificate is deposited, a 1·5 per cent. stamp duty or reserve tax charge results which will be based either on the instalment paid on the issue of the interim certificate or on the price paid for the certificate, depending on whether the depositary receipt holder was an original subscriber for the shares sold, or whether he bought the certificates in the market.

Amendment No. 208 follows on from that. It is a further amendment to clarify the application of clause 67 where securities are sold under instalment — an arrangement which provides for an interim certificate to be issued to the person buying the securities. That amendment is necessary because an interim certificate attracts stamp duty on transfer and it would be wrong for it to be treated as a depositary receipt. Doubts have been expressed about whether the definition of a depositary receipt provided in clause 69 could arguably apply to interim certificates of the type issued in connection with an instalment sale. The amendment is intended to make it clear that the definition does not apply to interim certificates.

Amendments Nos. 209 and 210 are the clearance services equivalent of amendments Nos. 205 to 207. The hon. Lady will remember that parallel provisions for clearance services and ADRs were necessary. Those amendments merely provide the equivalent for clearance services.

Amendments Nos. 211 to 214 deal with the reserve tax equivalent of what is provided on stamp duty in amendments Nos. 205 to 207. That is the other variation on the theme. Amendment No. 216 provides the stamp duty reserve tax equivalent only as applied to clearance services. Those are the various combinations of ADRs, or rather depositary receipts or clearance services and stamp duty or stamp duty reserve tax.

Amendments Nos. 217 to 220 provide the reserve tax equivalent of amendments Nos. 209 to 210, which is the clearance services provision for stamp duty. All those amendments hang together. They are followed by amendment No. 223 which is concerned only with definitions.

Amendments Nos. 184 and 215 were also mentioned. The hon. Lady mentioned the payment of the duty or the tax by instalment as well as the payment for shares by instalment. Those two amendments deal especially with that provision. First, they provide for the recovery of the 1·5 per cent. reserve tax charge under clause 92, where the depositary bank is not resident in the United Kingdom and has no branch or agency here. In those circumstances, the proposed new subsection (5A) will provide for the person to whom the shares are transferred, that is the bank's nominee company, to be liable.

Secondly, the amendments deal with the liability arising where the securities deposited are interim certificates issued in connection with the sale of shares under instalment arrangements. The amendment clarifies the application of the clause in those circumstances by making it clear that the charge arises on each instalment as it becomes payable, and that it does not arise on the entire sale price at the outset when the interim certificate is first deposited.

5.45 pm

Where shares are sold under instalment arrangements that involve the purchaser acquiring for a time an interim certificate rather than the underlying shares, it was, of course, always intended that clause 90 should apply to each instalment separately. Doubts have been expressed about whether clause 90, as it stands, has that effect in practice. Therefore, the new subsection is intended to make the position absolutely clear.

The amendments deal partly with the point raised by the hon. Lady and partly with the point about the holding of an interim certificate in the United Kingdom not for ordinary deposit receipt purposes. I hope that, for the sake of the hon. Lady, and for the sake of putting the reasons on the record, it has been helpful for me to comment on the points that she raised.

Amendment agreed to.

New Clause 34

TRANSFER PAYMENTS AND PRESERVED BENEFITS (NO. 2)

'(1) It shall be permissible for the trustees of an occupational pension scheme which is an exempt approved scheme under section 21 of the Finance Act 1970, to amend the rules of the scheme in regard to the calculation of transfer payments and of preserved benefits on behalf of any member ending pensionable service before the normal age of retirement under the scheme in accordance with the provisions of this section.

(2) For the purposes of this section "trustees", in relation to a scheme which is not set up or established under a trust means the managers of the scheme.

(3) To comply with the provisions of this section, the amended rules of the scheme shall require the trustees in respect of any member withdrawing from pensionable service before the normal pension age under the rules of the scheme at the withdrawing member's option either—

(a) to pay to an approved scheme a transfer payment in respect of the withdrawing of Members' entitlement of the sum that would be required by the withdrawing member's scheme for the purpose of admiting a new member of the same age, sex and pensionable remuneration as the withdrawing member in order to credit him with the same number of years of pensionable service as the withdrawing member, (but subject to modification in accordance with (4) below) or

(b) to award preserved benefits to the withdrawing member of the same actuarial value as that sum.

(4) In a case where an actuary certifies that on the date of the certificate the scheme is not fully funded, (which is to say that the scheme does not have sufficient assets to meet its liability in respect of the whole or any specified part of the accrued rights to benefit of its members), the transfer payment, or as the case may be, the part of the transfer payment which corresponds with that specified part of those accrued rights, may be reduced by the percentage by which the scheme is so shown to be deficient.

(5) A scheme which by 1st January 1987 has not amended its rules so that the transfer payments and the preserved benefits payable under the scheme are to be calculated on terms at least as favourable to the beneficiaries as those specified in this section shall not qualify as an exempt approved scheme in respect of its liabilities incurred after that date except by the permission of the Occupational Pensions Board.

(6) A scheme may apply to the Occupational Pensions Board for deferment of the latest date for the amendment of its rules in accordance with this section and to retain its status as an exempt approved scheme in respect of its liabilities incurred after that date to a date not later than 1st January 1992.

(7) The Secretary of State for Health and Social Security shall lay before Parliament regulations under this section subject to affirmative resolution of the House of Commons which shall specify the grounds on which the Occupational Pensions Board may approve applications for deferment under subsection (6) above.'. — [Sir Brandon Rhys Williams.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I think that the House is well aware of my long-standing interest in the protection of the rights of early leavers in occupational pension schemes. This issue is of significance when considering this year's Budget, because the Government have rightly introduced a measure in the Budget that will have a bearing on the way in which such schemes are required to balance their assets and liabilities.

About 18 months ago, there was an extensive debate about the way in which occupational pension schemes should be allowed to develop. Several people said that the tax regime enjoyed by those schemes was either too generous or was being abused. Rumour had it that in the 1985 Budget my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to make a dramatic reduction in the extent of the tax advantages enjoyed by private sector occupational pension schemes. Fortunately, the predictions published in the press at that time proved to be incorrect. But the debate served a useful purpose, as it drew attention to the fact that the 1970 Act was open to serious abuse.

I do not wish to detain the House long, but I should like to draw attention to a letter that I wrote last year to The Times, and which was published on Budget day, 19 March 1985. I shall not weary the House by reading it all, but the last two paragraphs are still relevant. I wrote:

"If the Chancellor were to require pension trustees to separate the assets which are allocated for individual beneficiaries from their general reserves, the former could retain the habitual tax exemption, while the income from the unallocated or excess funds could be taxed like that from any other company assets.

It would be a reasonable reform, and it would serve the good purpose of encouraging trustees to adopt conventional money-purchase principles. I would also encourage them to allocate each individual his full accumulated rights, while still in service, and to pay transfers for the early leavers of the full amount of their entitlements."

I do not think that much notice was taken of my letter at the time, because on the same day it became evident that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor would not make any dramatic change in the 1985 Budget. But the problems of the early leavers remain. I was, therefore, particularly pleased when, to the surprise of all concerned, the Chancellor announced in this year's Budget speech that he intended to tackle abuse of the 1970 Act along more or less exactly the lines that I had recommended in my letter. What the Government are doing is entirely right. There may need to be further study as to whether 105 per cent. is the right amount for funds to be able to retain without incurring any penalty, but, having listened to experts, I believe that the Government have got things right. However, no doubt that point can be further considered by the experts.

In general, the Government seem to be moving in the right direction. There has undoubtedly been a tendency for corporate treasurers to park funds in pension schemes when there was an occasional surplus in the availability of capital, so that advantage could be taken of the tax regime intended for the pension funds' beneficiaries. The money could be drawn out again when the company required it by the simple device of paying less money into the pension fund than would be demanded in the normal course of events by the annual increase in its liabilities.

The Government saw that abuse, and have acted to prevent it from continuing. When I heard the speech of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, I thought that the Treasury would at the same time produce a new regime for assessing the assets and liabilities of occupational pension funds, so that there would be a compelling advantage to funds to put the highest possible value on the rights of potential early leavers in order to reduce the likelihood of a tax penalty being incurred from time to time as the scheme's funds developed. But I understand that the Treasury has not seen the opportunity, or, if it has seen it, is not seizing it. That is why I have devised this new clause.

In a moment I shall go through the provisions that I recommend. However, if I took as long to explain the precise purpose of every line as I took to draft it, and if I added to that the amount of time that I insisted that senior people in the profession should devote to giving me advice, hon. Members would be here for a long time. I do not want to weary hon. Members with the precise implications of every line, but I hope that the provisions I am suggesting in my new clause will be drawn to the attention of the Treasury and of those interested in occupational pension schemes. In addition, I hope that other Departments that have an interest in how we provide for private retirement provision will also take an interest.

It is the Government's policy to encourage British citizens to be independent, to stand on their own feet financially, and to make their own provision for retirement. That is so much a part of Government policy that it hardly needs restating. In particular, it is the Government's stated policy to encourage the development and improvement of occupational pension schemes. This is not a matter of controversy; all hon. Members accept it. Moreover, few people would deny that there is now a tendency in Britain towards consumption rather than saving. That is an unhealthy feature of the economy. One need only compare the sort of goods in high street shops and the volume of imports of consumer goods that British people can afford with the volume of investment, particularly in manufacturing industry, to see that there is a rather unsatisfactory balance.

If the Government did something to encourage money to flow into fresh, real savings and investments, and which at the same time would discourage the flow of money into consumption—particularly as current wage settlements are often far higher than is justified by the growth in productivity—it would be a healthy move.

It is only reasonable to point out that early leavers in occupational pension schemes who change jobs in mid-career incur substantial losses. Even if I consult people like the Government Actuary, or study published returns, I find it difficult to make a fair assessment of the amount of money being lost by early leavers through their being paid their transfer values—or being awarded preserved benefits—which are far less than the value of the assets that they leave behind. However, it would appear that the figure is not less than £20 million every week, or £1,000 million every year. Some reliable estimates put the figure much higher than that; but I do not know whether to place too much emphasis on them, partly because it is difficult to assess the effect of the reforms that have been made in recent years, particularly with effect from 1 January 1986.

We hope that those reforms will alleviate the situation. But we are talking about a substantial loss of money, when that money should constitute part of each individual's real assets and part of his savings for a future time. The effect of that forfeiture is that there is a burden on employers to tip the amount of remuneration that goes to employees away from deferred pay, and to increase the amount of money that goes into immediate consumption through the pay packet or salary. More money flows in the direction of immediate consumption and less in the direction of savings. If the pension fund can make a profit from the early leavers, the employer does not have to subscribe so much to enable it to meet its liabilities.

If the Government have taken steps to prevent the abuse of the tax exemptions—they might be called the tax "privileges" — of occupational pension schemes, which are of long standing and were confirmed by the 1970 Act, we are right to consider whether the House should not also take this matter further. Schemes which are overfunded in relation to their present liabilities will be encouraged by this year's Budget to improve the award of benefits; but not enough is being done specifically to help the early leavers. If schemes do not take the opportunity to improve the level of benefits, they may have to take steps to bring their assets and liabilities into better balance in ways that could involve tax penalties. That is self-evident and quite proper. I had hoped that, in working out the details, Treasury Ministers would ensure that the tightening up would specifically include a compelling incentive to occupational pension schemes to put their houses in order in regard to the calculation of transfer values.

Two serious obstacles are believed to lie in the way of dramatic action to stop the occupational pension schemes from bleeding the early leavers: the fear that employers will protest strongly at the extra burdens and that there will be a political reaction; and secondly the understandable reluctance to bring in what might be held to constitute retrospective legislation.

Obviously, if early leavers are losing £1 billion a year and Parliament acts effectively to remedy that, the money must be found from somewhere. There is no necessity for that burden to fall immediately on employers because, to a great extent, occupational pension schemes at present are flush with funds. They could well afford to carry this extra burden, especially if the liability is spread over some years, without needing to go immediately to employers to require them to top up their schemes.

Firms which expect to recruit staff from other firms over some years would also recognise that, although there would be bigger outgoings with the staff they lost, there would be larger receipts with the staff they gained from other occupational pension schemes. Firms which expect to bring people on to their books in mid-career would be relieved of the necessity of putting enormous sums of money in the pension funds in respect of people whom they recruited from elsewhere, because they would bring with them a full transfer payment to justify their inclusion in the pension fund on reasonable terms.

There would also be a switch from payment of remuneration, mainly in the form of a stimulus to current spending, and some movement to saving through a formal trust instead. There is no reason why employers who are under pressure to give greater remuneration to their payroll staff and management should not point out that they will put more into the pension fund as a result of Parliament's intervention and that, therefore, there is genuinely less money available to distribute in the form of increased wages.

I would like to consider the position of firms that might judge that they would stand to lose substantially if they were required to pay transfer values that genuinely reflected the value of the early leavers' assets. Presumably, they would be firms that expected to have decreasing numbers of senior employees. The obvious case would be firms that had just been the victims of take-overs by unscrupulous bidders who would expect to discharge a large number of senior people with the objective of relieving the burden on the pension fund. They could then raid the pension fund to restore the expenditure which they had had to incur on acquiring the firm.

I have no sympathy with take-over bidders whose main objective is the pension fund with which they can recoup the expenditure laid out in acquiring the business. They attack defenceless people who have given long service to the firm so as to grab their rights and put the money into the bank. If Parliament intervenes to prevent such conduct, it will be applauded by every fair-minded person.

We must all respect the natural reluctance of Governments to let themselves be accused of introducing legislation with retrospective effect. We must concede that, when pension schemes have been in existence for many years, people who have been accumulating assets in those funds for 30 or 40 years will be involved. The assets held against the fund's liabilities have been built up under a stable tax regime which everyone understands and under employment contracts which are known to the parties and are generally in the form of the printed rules of occupational pension schemes. It could be said that it is undesirable, but it is a fact under the rules which have existed for years that transfers are not expected to be made at the full actuarial value. It is possible to argue that it is an accomplished fact. If we now try to insist that people of long service who leave their service before normal pension age should be given money which their employers did not expect to be obliged to give, Parliament's intervention to require employers to pay out much more money could be held to be retrospective.

I have deliberately drafted my proposals to escape that criticism. My provisions would reflect only on future tax concessions in respect of future liabilities. A firm that felt that it was under too much pressure because of my proposal that early leavers should be given a fair deal in future would have the option of winding up its fund within five years, and of making a new start in regard to its further liabilities incurred under the more generous regime which my new clause would impose. I do not envisage there being a danger — and professional people who work with these schemes agree—of a serious risk arising of a great number of firms winding up their schemes. I shall not go into the many reasons unless the House wishes me to do so.

The Government plainly do not think it is obligatory to leave the tax provisions totally unchanged in regard to the abuse of stacking funds into occupational schemes simply to take advantage of tax benefits. I believe that the House concurs with that. We can therefore feel free to amend the tax regimes of occupational schemes under the 1970 Act to prevent this abuse of overfunding. Surely we are also free to exercise the taxpayer's rights in the interests of securing natural justice for early leavers. The taxpayer has a stake in these private sector schemes because the essence of the tax concession is that tax liability is deferred until the money is paid out. The taxpayer therefore may have to wait 40 or more years before the tax which might have been levied on the firm is eventually recovered in the form of the income tax which has to be paid by the pensioner at the end of his days. In all that time, the money is building up, completely free of capital gains and other taxation, at compound interest in the hands of the firm's trustees. The taxpayer is making a substantial tax concession to the schemes and at the end of the day a large part of the funds of these schemes is, in effect, the taxpayer's money. I see no reason why taxpayers should be obliged to help these schemes in such a way if they continue to act in a way which nobody can seriously believe to be in accordance with natural justice or the best interests of the economy.

I took the opportunity yesterday, when there was a debate on the plight of the elderly, to point out how much it would assist the elderly if they were able to rely on better incomes from occupational pension schemes. I pointed out that there is a major deficiency in these schemes, which is that the high fliers and other people who have to change their jobs stand to lose so much under the way in which the transfer valuations are made. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security suggested that nothing should be done immediately, and that we should see how the transfer regulations which were brought in at the beginning of the year would work out in practice.

As I have said, I have consulted a large number of well-informed people. I do not think that any of them has expressed the view that what has been done so far to remedy the abuse of early leavers will put the problem right. That is not the expectation of the actuaries or the people who operate in the area. Of course, I recognise and am grateful for the work that has been done by the Department of Health and Social Security and others concerned to make some improvement. However, they have not met the problem fully. That is the opinion of well-informed people.

Let us suppose we are all wrong, and that what was done at the beginning of this year has solved the problem. In that case, there would be no extra burden to the occupational pension schemes if the Government were to accept my new clause because they would simply be confirming something which they had already brought about. In that case there would not be any serious risk of imposing new burdens on the schemes.

I should like the House to give serious consideration to this problem. We need to encourage job mobility, we need better provision for retirement, and we have to ensure that taxpayers' money is not misused, as it certainly is by occupational pension schemes that act against the more efficient running of the economy. We have to uphold natural justice. I therefore trust that the House will agree to give my new clause a Second Reading.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has a deserved reputation for having, over a long period, expressed an interest in and campaigned on behalf of early leavers from pension fund schemes. I think that by that campaign, which he has pursued by raising the matter in the House on numerous occasions and by other means such as writing to The Times last year, as he reminded us, he has done a great deal to draw public attention to one of the problems which has become more acute in recent years. People tend to change jobs more often and, therefore, the number of those who leave pension schemes before retirement age has been increasing.

Credit is due to my hon. Friend for having, if not single-handedly, changed the climate and approach of many trustees of pension schemes to the way in which they consider the position of early leavers. He has certainly done something towards encouraging a greater awareness of their problems and, as a consequence, by practical means early leavers are now not treated quite as badly as they were a few years ago. I would accept that there is probably further to go on this issue.

My hon. Friend's new clause is ingenious and, in technical terms, it is well organised. He has taken a great deal of trouble not only to specify clearly what his objectives are, but to find a means of establishing how they can be achieved in statute. However, I am sure that he will not be surprised to learn that I do not feel inclined to recommend to the House that his new clause be accepted.

My basic reason for opposing the new clause has nothing to do with whether I am sympathetic to the position of early leavers, or to many of the arguments that my hon. Friend has deployed. The central point is that an occupational pension scheme is a voluntary arrangement set up by an employer for his employees and, although the Revenue has rules governing the maximum level of benefits that a scheme may offer if it is to qualify for tax exemption, I do not think that it would be right for the tax system to be used as a means of compelling trustees to dispose of their resources in a particular way.

My hon. Friend obviously takes a different view. However, we believe that it is right to leave the trustees of schemes with the freedom to provide whatever benefits they consider appropriate in relation to membership of the scheme and, of course, what they presume would over a period of time, be in the interest of employment in the company concerned.

In principle, that is the right approach. Even if it were not, I do not think that it would be right to entrust the Inland Revenue with the responsibility of establishing whether the distribution was properly organised to meet the approval which would be required to avoid an extra charge to tax.

My hon. Friend's new clause introduces a new condition for tax exemption and any scheme that did not offer full protection in those terms for the pension rights of early leavers would lose its approved status. As I said, I do not regard that as a natural or, perhaps, proper use of the tax system for pensions, because the tax system is essentially designed to ensure that tax relief is given only for bona fide pension arrangements without looking through them to try to determine the quality or distribution under the schemes.

Last night my hon. Friend spoke of introducing what he called an "overpowering" incentive. Today he used the term a "compelling" incentive. Certainly, to use the tax lever in the way in which he has suggested today to deal with the content of pension schemes would amount to an overpowering and compelling instrument for achieving that end. I am not at all convinced that it would be proper to proceed in that way.

My hesitation is strengthened by looking at subsection (7) of new clause 34 where my hon. Friend is inviting the Secretary of State for Social Services and not my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to lay regulations before Parliament. The approach to the conduct of pension schemes really is a matter for the DHSS rather than for the Treasury. I am not in a position to judge whether the new regulations will have more favourable results than my hon. Friend suspects. However, my right hon. and hon. Friends in the DHSS will need to follow that through.

I see certain problems, even if one accepts the principle of what my hon. Friend is trying to achieve, because if a scheme failed to satisfy the Inland Revenue on his new condition, it would lose tax exemption on all its resources. That would affect long-stay members of pension schemes, shorter-stay members, and so on. I cannot believe that that consequence would be in scale with the objective that my hon. Friend is trying to achieve.

There can be little doubt that our proposals this year for dealing with pension scheme surpluses will result in improvements in pension benefits. Like my hon. Friend, I hope very much that a material part of that improvement will go towards providing a better deal for early leavers than many schemes have in the past. If the debate serves no more immediate purpose than drawing to public attention the case for doing so, the House and the public will have cause to be grateful to my hon. Friend for it. However, the subject of early leavers, important as it is, must remain a matter for the trustees of individual schemes to decide upon in the light of their own circumstances.

While I have sympathy with the principle of the case that my hon. Friend is advancing in terms of better provision for early leavers, and while I recognise the changes in employment patterns of recent years and the way in which early leavers have always had a worse deal than those who have stayed through to retirement, I am sceptical about the method that he has chosen as the prospective means of trying to achieve it. Following this short debate, I shall discuss the matter with my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Health and Social Security because it is right that I should give something more than a commitment just to draw it to their attention. It should be drawn to their attention, but I should like to talk to them about it.

I doubt whether there are likely to be circumstances, even in the light of all that, which would justify using a direct tax weapon to achieve what, after all, is a structural change in the pattern of pension provision. A structural change has begun to take place, and we may encourage it, but I reluctantly part company with my hon. Friend on the suggestion of using tax penalties to achieve it.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I should like to comment on some of the remarks of my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary. If he had had longer to consider the precise implications of the new clause, he would not have made them: his criticisms of my proposals do not bear comparison with my text.

My hon. Friend takes the view that private occupational pension schemes are voluntary arrangements, and it would be wrong to use tax as a means of compelling the trustees to dispose of their resources in a particular way. However, the tax regime that applies to those schemes is already extremely rigid. Many regulations have been introduced through the Inland Revenue's administrative control or in statute which require the trustees to act in a particular way. In my new clause, I am merely suggesting that there should be one more provision for the future.

My hon. Friend also made the mistake of thinking that what I am suggesting would have a retrospective effect; but I spent quite a long time seeking to explain that it would not. I did not go into the new clause line by line, but it would have no retrospective effect because the trustees, in so far as they had acquired liabilities or assets up to the date on which the new clause came into operation —which would probably be deferred for as much as five years—would be able to continue to enjoy precisely the same tax regime as they do now.

The other thing that surprises me is that at the very moment when the Government are introducing their own changes in the tax provisions governing these schemes they should object to a Back Bencher trying to do the same. My hon. Friend is not logical if he recommends to the House that we should approve the tax changes in regard to the overfunded schemes, yet says that there should be no tax changes in regard to schemes that offend in other ways against the principles under which they were set up.

I cannot believe that anyone on either side of the House seriously thinks that it is right that early leavers should be given transfer values or preserved benefits that are far less than the value of the assets that the scheme is holding for them should they decide to remain in the service of the employer. That offends against natural justice. I cannot accept that my hon. Friend's speech today is to be the last word on the subject.

My hon. Friend made a commitment, which I value, and I trust him implicitly. He agreed that he would commit himself to discuss the matter with the DHSS. I suggest that he should also discuss it with the Department of Employment, because there is a substantial interest for that Department, too, in promoting job mobility, particularly for senior management and high fliers.

[Sir Brandon Rhys Williams]

I conclude with the same recommendation that I made last night, that the Government should set up an interdepartmental study of the matter and produce a White Paper at an early date. In view of my hon. Friend's reaction, I can see that it would be futile to press my new clause now, so I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 35

LEAVE TRAVEL FACILITIES FOR MEMBERS OF THE NORTHERN CONSTABULARY

"(1) No charge to Schedule E tax shall arise in respect of travel facilities provided for members of the Northern Constabulary and their spouses and children posted in Orkney, Shetland or the Western Isles, going on or returning from leave, up to a maximum of three return journeys per year.

(2) This applies whether the charge would otherwise have arisen under—

(a) section 36 of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1975 (certain vouchers treated as benefits in kind);

(b) section 61 of the Finance Act 1976 (benefits in kind for the higher paid); or

(c) Chapter I of Part VIII of the Taxes Act (Charge to Schedule E tax); and applies to the use of travel vouchers or warrants for particular journeys.

(3) This section has effect for the year 1986-87 and subsequent years of assessment."—[Mr. Wallace.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

When we consider the Finance Bill in the House, we are used to dealing with provisions involving millions, sometimes even billions, of pounds, but, according to a written answer given to me on 7 February this year by the former Financial Secretary to the Treasury, the cost to the Exchequer, if the new clause were implemented, would be "unlikely to exceed £40,000 per annum."—[Official Report, 7 February 1986; Vol 91, c. 279.]

In the context of the Finance Bill, it seems to be a relatively small sum. However, if the new clause were passed, substantial justice would be done to the police officers posted to my constituency and that of the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart).

I should like to give a brief background on how the matter arises. Until 1981-82, police officers posted to the Western Isles and Orkney and Shetland were given three free journeys a year to the mainland for annual leave purposes, for themselves and their family, and a car. They never received cash in hand. They got no compensation if all the warrants were not used up. That arrangement was in accordance with an agreement of the Police Council for the United Kingdom. Doubts were raised subsequently about the non-taxability of the warrants. Thereafter, the Inland Revenue concluded that the warrants should be taxed under section 36 of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1975. Since the financial year of 1983-84, tax has been paid.

The Northern Constabulary covers the local authority areas of Highland region, Orkney islands council, Shetland islands council and Western Isles islands council. The area, although small in population, is the largest geographical area of any police constabulary in the United Kingdom. The officers, who come from all over the area, have no choice of where they are posted, and so many from the mainland, the Highland region, are posted to the remote islands of my constituency and that of the right hon. Member for Western Isles.

The new clause seeks to return us to the situation before 1983-84. In proposing the new clause, I have leaned heavily on section 37 of the Finance Act 1977, which allows exemption for travel warrants for members of the armed forces. When that provision was under discussion in the House, on 14 July 1977, the then Financial Secretary in the Labour Government, the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), said that it applied

"not only to travel vouchers and warrants for particular journeys but also to allowances and other payments for and in respect of leave travel, whether or not a warrant is available".

He went on to say that service men are subject to discipline and restrictions on where they can travel. They are subject to recall and they commit an offence if they do not return. He said:

"They are subject to compulsory transfer without warning from one part of the country to another and they are regarded as being on duty at all times".—[Official Report, 14 July 1977; Vol. 935-1, c. 829.]

6.30 pm

We submit that policemen in the category covered by the new clause are in a similar position to members of the armed forces. As I have said, under the Police (Discipline) (Scotland) Regulations 1967 they cannot refuse a posting. They are always subject to recall when on leave. They are subject to transfer and are liable to have leave cancelled at very short notice or to have rest days cancelled.

That may be a concept which hon. Members representing other parts of the country may not readily be able to understand. If one happened to be the only policeman on the island of Unst in the very northern part of Shetland, one would never be off duty. At any time during the day or night the people of the island might wish to turn to the police officer. That is an onerous duty to impose on any police officer and that is the position in many parts of my constituency.

Under the police regulations there are restrictions on the private lives of these serving police officers. Although these are the formal regulations to which officers are subject, we must also consider the reality of life in the remoter parts of the country. The officers are obliged to take their families with them because they would have to pay additional rent if the family remained behind. There may be no shops in the remote location to which an officer is posted for his wife and family to spend time in. Even planning leave and holidays — which is the subject matter of the new clause — can often be hazardous because of unforeseen weather conditions. As it is important to arrange relief and to provide a locum when a police officer in an outlying area goes on leave, early notice must be given of holiday arrangements.

The Scottish Police Federation sent a briefing to Scottish hon. Members which described the policeman's lot on an island as one in which the officer suffered from:

"Isolation, frustration, despair — and now anger at taxation."

These are no mean words to come from a body such as the Scottish Police Federation.

Hon. Members may wonder why these officers should be entitled to relief on transport costs when other police officers serving within mainland parts of the Northern constabulary are not so entitled. The travel concession award only takes the police officer from the island to the nearest place on the mainland by air or by sea. I visited the Transport Office before the debate and discovered that the cost of a return flight from Lerwick to Inverness is £138; the cost of a return flight from Kirkwall to Inverness is £110; and from Stornoway to Inverness it is £80. Obviously other figures could be provided for ferry crossings and other routes. However, once the officer reaches the mainland he must make arrangements for himself and his family and that must come out of his own pocket.

We are not comparing these concessions with the islands' allowances which local government employees or employees of other companies receive when they are transferred to these locations. Often these are cash-in-hand allowances which can be used how the recipient wishes. We are considering a limited case of travel warrants.

The police officers involved have visited my surgeries and expressed their great frustration over what has happened. They would like to see a return to the pre-1983 position. Although there was an exemption from tax, that was not necessarily a precedent and the floodgates were not opened. For that reason, I ask the Minister, even if he feels that there is something defective about the new clause, to make a positive response and show a sensitivity to the problems faced by police officers in my constituency. I hope that he will show a willingness to meet the difficulty which I have highlighted in the debate.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): I need only make a short intervention in support of the new clause and the excellent submission made by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace).

The system had worked fairly well for many years until, in the last year or two, someone regarded these warrants as liable for tax under section 36 of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1975. Police officers directed to go to the islands have no choice in the matter. They must go or suffer the consequences under the discipline of the police force. Although it may be a surprise for my hon. Friends to learn this, not all the officers are pleased to move in that direction. Some feel a sense of isolation or object as family men to the high cost of living on the islands. The islands' councils have made provisions for other people in the form of island allowances. Some companies and indeed the Civil Service have also made concessions. However, no concessions are made to police officers. The officers involved have a real sense of grievance. They are discriminated against in relation to their mainland colleagues.

The effect of the Finance Act (No. 2) 1975 was modified at a later stage to meet objections from members of the armed forces. As the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland has explained, the criterion is exactly the same for the armed forces as it is for the police. Justice demands that that concession—if that is the correct word, or at least that modification—ought to apply to the police as well.

Many of us have been pressing the Exchequer for some time to arrive at an equitable decision on this matter. Officers directed to the islands face hardship and many are liable for duty around the clock. Fair treatment would demand that they have the same right as members of the armed forces. The removal of this sense of injustice could be achieved by the acceptance of the new clause. I hope that the Minister will take that into account.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I rise briefly to support the arguments put by my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart).

I was the parliamentary adviser to the Scottish Police Federation for six years from 1970. In 1971 the Police Council for the United Kingdom agreed that police officers serving in the Western Isles, Orkney and Shetland would be entitled to three travel warrants a year. That, after all, did not involve a large number of travel warrants. The right hon. Member for Western Isles and my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland have explained the justification for that. That entitlement operated for 10 years. We would all be happy to see the allowance for police officers re-established and administered in that way, without necessarily having the statute altered. There were no problems with the procedure which existed for 10 years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland made the important point about the comparison between the armed forces and the police force. I must repeat that the position of the police officers in the islands is the same as that of the armed forces. Indeed, in many respects it is more onerous, as police officers are required to carry out their duties in a more focused way than are members of the armed forces.

It is perfectly fair to remark that the case has not been made for an island allowance. One can make a case for that, but it is not the case being made this evening. Many people work on islands for a variety of reasons. They volunteer for island positions, often for promotion, and they are well aware of the pros and cons. But travel warrants are a fair way of dealing with the problems of distance and separation which police officers encounter, especially because of their responsibilities in small communities.

It is true that travel warrants are used for annual leave, but to suggest that that is their sole use is inaccurate. They are a lifeline and are used for visiting the mainland, whether because of bereavement, to see sick relatives or for treatment. This is a fair case and, knowing that the Minister is reasonable, I hope that he will listen to it sympathetically.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Like my hon. Friends the Members for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), and the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart), I shall be brief in completing this quartet from the far north which is seeking to persuade the Minister on this point.

It is an unjust anomaly that members of the armed forces, rightly, enjoy this concession while the police do not, although its terms and description are equally applicable to the police. As my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland said, service men are also subject to discipline, restrictions and compulsory transfer, and are regarded as being on duty at all times. The position of the sole police officer serving on the island of Unst, which he described, is repeated elsewhere in the Western Isles,

[Mr. Charles Kennedy]

Orkney and Shetland. Surely the position of police officers is identical in every sense with that of service men in respect of this concession.

In March my hon. Friends and I had further correspondence with the then Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who said in a letter to me:

"While I certainly do not undervalue the work done by these officers, nor minimise the importance of these trips to their families, I am afraid that it is plain that a valuable benefit does arise which ought, in principle, to be taxed."

The second half of that sentence makes the case for why that benefit should not be taxed. It was, indeed, a valuable benefit, not in terms of the Treasury's coffers — it receives an insignificant, negligible income from this— but to the individuals and their families.

I do not think that it will blow the Government's spending plans before the general election if the concession is conceded, or that the Star Chamber will descend on the heads of Treasury Ministers if they give way on this point. Therefore, I hope that they will be sympathetic and constructive. It is a genuine point and has all-party support. All hon. Members from this part of the country appreciate the difficulty and hope that the Government can do something about it.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) moved his new clause eloquently. In passing and removed from the rest of my comments, I wish to remark that the Committee of the whole House at the beginning of May coincided with a by-election in Derbyshire, West and tonight this stage coincides with a by-election in Newcastle-under-Lyme. On the previous occasion it was notable that alliance Members were absent from the Benches, but I notice that more of them are present today. Whether that is an index of their forecast of the election result will be for time to tell.

The new clause seeks to exempt from tax the travel warrants provided for police officers in the Northern constabulary who serve in the offshore islands, so that they, their families and cars can return to the mainland three times a year.

I can understand the hon. Members' concern for the 120 or so officers in question and their families posted to the islands far away from other members of their families, and the authority's action in making it easier for them to be reunited with their families at reasonable intervals, but I am afraid that in law there can be no doubt that the warrants are taxable, and that since it cannot be argued that the officers or their families are in any way travelling in the performance of the officers' duties, there is no way in which, under the present rules, relief can be allowed.

Nor would it be right to allow relief on what amounts to a valuable benefit. I also took the global sum, which hon. Gentlemen have mentioned. But the cost of a return journey between Shetland and the mainland is about £130, and, as each officer is entitled to three journeys a year for him, his wife, family and car, the total benefit can easily amount to £1,000. These travel warrants are for what is clearly private travel, and to allow relief in those circumstances would merely open the door to a host of similar claims from other groups who would claim that they were being unfairly treated. It would immediately create an indefensible anomaly.

Sir Russell Johnston: What the Minister describes as an anomaly operated for a decade. Since it was originally established by the Police Council for the United Kingdom, why not let it continue?

Mr. Brooke: I noted the word "decade" against the hon. Gentleman's name and I shall come to that later.

Civilian employees of the Highland regional authority are posted to these islands and receive——

Mr. Wallace: That is factually incorrect. Apart from the islands close to the constituencies of my hon. Friends the Members for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) and for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy), Highland region does not extend to Orkney, Shetland and the Western Isles which are in entirely separate local authority areas. There is no posting of local authority staff from Highland region to them, unless they go to promoted posts of their own free will.

Mr. Brooke: As the hon. Gentleman said, there are allowances for other people being posted to the islands. I accept that they are in the form of cash, not warrants, but if tax relief were granted on these warrants and this travel —I am not suggesting that the hon. Gentlemen who spoke would be quick to seek further relief for other groups — there would be pressure for relief to be available to others. It is difficult to see why a broadly similar allowance paid to policemen serving in the same islands should be exempt from tax while civilians pay tax on their allowances.

I shall now deal with the decade point raised by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland quoted the speech of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) during the passage of the relevant legislation. Warrants such as these have been taxable in the hands of all employees since 1976-77 by virtue of section 36 of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1975, which was introduced by the Labour Government. Its passage preceded the moment in March 1977 when the Liberal party was seduced into supporting that Government in office, so I cannot hold the Liberals responsible for the 1975 Act. But that was the genesis of it.

It was not until 1983 that the Inland Revenue became aware that warrants were being provided to these officers. The Revenue immediately made arrangements for tax to be collected in the normal way on the value of warrants from 1983-84. The employer agreed to meet the policemen's liability for earlier years. I accept that, up to 1983, the policemen were not being taxed, but the authority acknowledged that there was a liability and met the outstanding liability in 1983-84 when it was discovered.

Various hon. Members made much of the comparison with the armed forces. Section 37 of the Finance Act 1977 exempts from tax travel facilities provided for members of the armed forces going on or returning from leave. This is a specific and limited exception designed to meet the special and unique circumstances of forces life. A service man is always on duty and is subject to instant recall from leave and immediate transfer. The requirements of military discipline and national security, which are not features of a police officer's job, demand a high degree of mobility. It was agreed on all sides that it was fair and reasonable to exempt service men's leave facilities from tax. This specific exemption is designed to meet special circumstances which do not apply elsewhere and is not a reason for exempting other benefits. I could go through the issue of the law again to illustrate this point.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye was seductive on the cost, but one still has to come back to the principle of the tax. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber cited a number of cases which may involve journeys of travel, but in the process he demonstrated that those journeys were not being undertaken as part of an officer's duty. That is the critical criterion by which relief, under the legislation, is judged.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): I think that I shall be only hon. Member on this side of the House to speak in a different accent. Certainly I cannot be accused of having any constituency or personal interest. I have never visited these charming and delightful constituencies, represented by the hon. Members who have spoken, and I think it unlikely that I will. It is even more unlikely that I will fall foul of the police in those islands.

I have listened to the debate with great interest. I have received representations on this issue from my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and other hon. Friends who represent Scottish constituencies. I came to this debate with an open mind and I appreciate the importance of the principle which the Minister has put before the House. I am not convinced, having listened to the debate, that we should not amend the law in the way suggested by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace). If the benefit is so valuable that it is worth £1,000, it follows that the tax on that benefit is very heavy. If an officer takes advantage of the warrants the tax must be about £290.

I am impressed by the argument that people do not usually have any choice about being posted. At the time of local government reorganisation I can well remember the sense of grievance felt by people in the west midlands. Fifteen years ago, policemen found that the area in which they were based was transferred from one authority to another. Police were transferred willy-nilly; they had no choice in the matter. Those who had joined the police force intending to be police in rural areas suddenly found themselves, as the result of local government boundaries being redrawn, in a totally different police force in a different area. I can understand that for policemen who are posted, against their wishes but because it is a disciplinary service, to the islands it is important for them to visit their family and elderly parents. From time to time they must take advantage—not a great benefit—of the three travel warrants a year. Those warrants may cover periods of sickness and family needs—the need to take children to see specialists. I do not consider that these warrants are of great importance but the tax on them is fairly significant, especially for people on low incomes.

We should take a more sympathetic attitude than that of the Government. It is significant that no other examples of people who would be posted involuntarily to the islands have been given. The Minister referred to people working for local authorities. If such people are sent considerable distances to another place of work, I would take a similar sympathetic attitude. The Minister did not give any other specific examples, and I would have been more impressed by his argument if he had been able to tell us the number of people who would fall into the new category if we passed the new clause.

I am not impressed by the Minister's argument with regard to the anomaly of the Army. Its position seems similar to that of the police. If the Minister intends to make a fetish of the principle of people being taxed on these benefits, I find it difficult to justify treating members of the armed forces differently. I would not have been surprised if the Minister—in the interests of consistency—had asked us to remove the benefits and tax relief enjoyed by members of the armed forces. I emphasise I am not suggesting that, but one cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Donald Stewart: At the beginning the Army were caught in the same trap and an exemption was made for it. That is all that we are asking to be made for the police.

Mr. Davis: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's valid point.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) in one small particular. He argued that it was not necessary to change the law. I do not agree. It is necessary to be open, above aboard and frank about these exceptions. I do not agree that this should be done in some extra-statutory way against the wish of the House. It is right and proper that we should make exemptions where they are justified, but we must be clear about the reasons for making such exemptions. That is why I am impressed by the new clause.

I accept the Minister's point that it was an Act introduced 11 years ago by the Labour Government which had the effect of taxing benefits received by people who enjoyed the benefit of travel warrants. I do not take that criticism too seriously. We have found that, during the passage of legislation—there are many examples with which I will not bore the House—the Government have subsequently found it necessary to amend the law because it has had an effect which was not intended.

In the Bill we have the classic example of the American service men who are now to be exempt from car tax. On a previous occasion the Government's legislation imposed car tax—quite rightly—on American service men. The Minister cannot make too much about the errors of my predecessors. I do not believe it was the intention of my hon. Friends in the previous Labour Government to impose a tax in this situation. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber may make fun about our not spotting the defect at the time, but I do not believe it is a serious issue. Since 1983 some people have found that they are subject to tax, especially those who get the benefit of workplace nurseries. My hon. Friends and I have voted to restore that privileged position to those people who found the imposition of that tax a great burden.

If the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland decides to press the new clause to a Division, I shall advise my hon. Friends to join him in the Lobby.

Mr. Wallace: I listened to the Minister's reply with disappointment. I accept that, as the law stands, these warrants are taxable, but that was the reason for bringing forward the new clause. One of our functions in the House is to change the law.

My hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) said that these warrants were not being taxed during a 10-year period and that that was not against the law. Although they were exempt from tax, there was no clamour from other sections of the community for the exemption and no other specific examples have been given.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I am broadly sympathetic with the new clause. Although I understand that many members of the Northern constabulary are obliged to travel to places to which perhaps they do not wish to be posted, how many members of the constabulary in Orkney and Shetland are posted against their will?

Mr. Wallace: I understand that 108 officers serve on the Western Isles, Orkney and Shetland and that 21 of them are native. It is impossible to go through the 87 non-native officers and ask them whether they are willing to go to the islands. Neither the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) nor I can understand why anyone could possibly not want to go there, but the Scottish Police Federation has made representations to us and individual police officers have drawn our attention to the considerable disadvantages of being separated from their families. It is not that they are wildly reluctant about their posting; it is just that it is simply not possible to be with relatives for the weekend as can be done on the mainland, even if quite large distances are involved.

The Minister gave no example of groups who would seek a similar exemption and mentioned the armed forces. As he read out the conditions of members of the armed forces, I thought that he seemed to describe the conditions which I said applied to the police. He rightly said that it is important for reasons of national security that there is mobility, but I do not think that he would devalue the importance of the police to local security. Moreover, they are always subject to recall when on leave.

Relatively, police officers might not have to travel very far, but the costs involved can be high—as high as, if not higher than, those incurred by members of the armed forces. We seek only comparability.

Mr. Kennedy: Does my hon. Friend agree that, although we would not have been astounded to discover that the Minister disagreed with us, we have been surprised by his negative response? He has given no undertaking to consider the matter. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is significant that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis), who said that he approached the issue with an open mind, feels that the balance of the argument rests with us? Is there not therefore a case for inviting the Minister to give a commitment to consider the matter again?

Mr. Wallace: The Minister will have heard my hon. Friend. We might have to consider how to dispose of the new clause if the Minister does not undertake to reconsider, especially in view of the clear comparability between the police and the armed services and the lack of examples of groups who would seek the same exemption.

I was grateful for the support of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis). Although I had not intended to push the clause to a Division, in view of the Minister's negative response and the fact that an independent arbiter—if there can be such in the House—has so clearly seen where the weight of the argument lies, I invite the House to support the clause.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Vehicles Excise Duty: Miscellaneous Amendments

Mr. Brooke: I beg to move amendment No. 31, in page 101, line 4, at end insert—

'Tower wagons used by street lighting authorities etc.

1A. In section 4 of the 1971 Act (exemptions from duty) in subsection (2) for the definition of "tower wagon" there shall be substituted the following—

"'tower wagon' means a goods vehicle—

(a) into which there is built, as part of the vehicle, any expanding extensible contrivance designed for facilitating the erection, inspection, repair or maintenance of overhead structures or equipment, and

(b) which is neither constructed nor adapted for use nor used for the conveyance of any load other than—

(i) such a contrivance and articles used in connection therewith, and

(ii) articles used in connection with the installation or maintenance, by means of such a contrivance, of materials or apparatus for lighting streets, roads or public places".'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Government amendment No. 32.

Mr. Brooke: The two amendments propose to extend the current definition of a tower wagon used for street lighting purposes by a local authority or local authority contractor to allow for the carriage on the vehicle of street lighting poles and lamp standards.

Tower wagons used by local authorities or by a firm under contract to a local authority for the purposes of installing or repairing street lighting are exempt from the payment of vehicle excise duty. The current legislation allows for the carriage of articles used in connection with the tower wagon's lifting device. However, the High Court has held that, under current legislation, if street lighting poles are carried the entitlement to exemption from excise duty is lost.

It is now becoming not uncommon for local authorities and their contractors to carry street lighting poles on these vehicles. Many tower wagons are being designed specifically with space for the carriage of poles. It is both reasonable and in line with the original intention behind the exemption that this practice should not deprive the vehicles concerned from entitlement to the vehicle excise duty exemption.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 32, in page 103, line 43 at end insert—

'Tower wagons used by street lighting authorities etc.

6A. In section 4 of the 1972 Act (exemptions from duty) in subsection (2) for the definition of "tower wagon" there shall be subsitituted the following—

"'tower wagon' means a goods vehicle—

(a) into which there is built, as part of the vehicle, any expanding or extensible contrivance designed for facilitating the erection, inspection, repair or maintenance of overhead structures or equipment, and

(b) which is neither constructed nor adapted for use nor used for the conveyance of any load other than—

(i) such a contrivance and articles used in connection therewith, and

(ii) articles used in connection with the installation or maintenance, by means of such a contrivance, of materials or apparatus for lighting streets, roads or public places".'.—[Mr. Brooke.]

Clause 20

Relief for Interest

7.15 pm

Dr. McDonald: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 17, line 31, at end insert

'and for basic rate taxpayers shall be £31,000'.

When I tabled the amendment I was not aware that the issue would be subject to the most interesting speculation in the press today, including, for example, the leader in The Guardian, in which we are told:

"Mrs Thatcher's advisers are reported to be urging her to raise the amount of mortgage eligible for tax relief from £30,000 to £35,000. This idea is said to have been scorned by the Prime Minister's own harrowing househunting experiences. When she and Denis eventually found a £400,000 retirement home in Dulwich . . . she became convinced that home owners, particularly first time buyers, needed extra financial help."

I read that with wry amusement. We had begun to think that the Prime Minister was getting out of touch, but we did not think that the extent of the reality was quite so great that she had become sorry for the first-time buyers when looking for a £400,000 retirement home. When my constituents are looking for properties, they are looking for small flats, maisonettes or small houses at the cost of between £30,000 and £35,000. That is part of the source of concern expressed in the amendment.

In passing, I should mention that this is the only kind of amendment that the Opposition can table. The Opposition cannot table an amendment that increases the burden of taxation generally. The political point of tabling the amendment will become clear in my remarks because, as it stands, the amendment does not make a great deal of sense.

There are two points here. As I have indicated, our concern is over the rapid rise in house prices, particularly in London and the south-east. Throughout the country house prices in the second quarter of this year have risen by 11 per cent. over the previous year, but the regional differences are quite significant. In Greater London house prices are rising at a rate of 21·9 per cent. on the previous year and, in the south-east as a whole, at the rate of 16 per cent. This is a very sharp increase in house prices and places enormous burdens on those who are looking for houses, particularly in London and the south-east. I am talking about modest flats, maisonettes and three-bedroomed semis—the average house for the average couple.

The £30,000 ceiling may soon present difficulties for such purchasers. This is especially true if we bear in mind that the average mortgage advance for first-time buyers in 1985 in the Greater London area, according to figures supplied by the Building Societies Association, was £29,482. In other words, the average mortgage requirement is almost up against the limit for first-time buyers. In the south-east generally, the mortgage advanced to first-time buyers is just over £25,000. The limit is likely to be reached for many purchasers buying quite modest accommodation in London and the south-east.

We understand the concern about that, but the Prime Minister's sudden concern in this matter is purely political. If the right hon. Lady has it in mind to raise the limit for mortgage interest relief by £5,000 a year, she is thinking of Tory voters turning to the alliance in London and the south-east. If she were seriously concerned about the prospects for home buyers, particularly in London and the south-east, far more would have been done to prevent the sharp increase in house prices, which arises not just from the shortage of housing in the public sector, but from the shortage of housing in the private sector.

The number of new dwellings built last year was 189,000, which was 33 per cent. lower than in 1978. The Conservative party claims to be concerned about this and to wish to promote home ownership, but it is responsible for building so many fewer private homes than the last Labour Government did in 1978 that prices are shooting through the roof and many people, particularly young couples, cannot afford to buy anything. They cannot turn to the public sector either, as we all know from our experience as constituency Members of Parliament that houses and flats to rent from the local authority are simply not available.

The queues for new housing have trebled in London and the south-east, as well as in other parts of the country. The Prime Minister's sudden wakening to the thought that many young couples in London and the south-east find it difficult to afford a house has led her to believe that raising the mortgage interest relief will solve the problem. It will not. Money should be put into public sector housing to provide homes for those in need, and private house building should be encouraged. It would be if the economy were growing at a proper rate and if there were not the drag of so many unemployed.

The other part of the amendment is designed to limit mortgage tax relief to the standard rate of income tax. We support this form of relief for those wishing to buy their own property, but we see no reason why very large mortgages for rich people should be subsidised to the extent that they are by the Exchequer. In 1985-86, about 750,000 mortgagors received relief in excess of the basic rate of income tax. This represents about three quarters of all the higher rate taxpayers. Just under 1 million mortgagors received enormous relief from the Tory Government.

This year the number has increased. It is estimated that about 800,000 mortgagors will benefit from the higher rate relief. These people know how to play the system and push up their mortgages to make sure that they obtain the maximum relief at the higher rate of income tax. The cost of that to the Exchequer is more than £1 billion. That figure was given in Hansard on 11 June, at column 201.

We are in favour of aiding people to buy their own homes, but we have in mind the average person buying an average home. That £1 billion should not be squandered on a tiny minority of higher rate taxpayers. It is disgraceful that such sums should be used in such a way. We make it clear that we shall limit the relief to the basic rate, which will benefit those on average incomes buying average homes. There are far too many homeless people. I have examples in my constituency of people whose marriages have broken up, and the wife and children are living in a council house or flat while the husband has to resort to sleeping at his place of work or in the car. That £1 billion cannot be justified as a proper expenditure by any Government while people are homeless and unable to find the council houses or flats that they desperately need.

The Labour party in government will put a stop to the squandering of revenue in such a way, while at the same time we shall ensure that average couples can buy the houses that they need with assistance from the Government through mortgage tax relief.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): We are grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) for tabling the amendment. She was right when she said that what the Prime Minister has in mind has more to do with the forthcoming general election than with the housing problems. We saw that at the previous election. One of the last actions of the first Conservative Government was to increase the limit of mortgage tax relief from £25,000 to £30,000. I was against it then, the Treasury has always been against it, and I would not be surprised if the present Treasury Ministers were also against it. It does not make sense.

We all know that all that one gets out of the nonsense of excessive tax relief for housing investment is an increase in the price of houses. My hon. Friend made this clear when she pointed out that prices in the south-east are rising at 16 per cent. a year. First-time buyers need help to get on to the property ladder, but thereafter their needs can be dealt with quite adequately by the operation of the housing market.

It is easy to increase the limit for mortgage relief, but it is difficult to bring it down. It has some similarities with the problem of inflation. Inflation can rise easily. To bring it down requires painful experiences. So it will be in this case. People take out mortgages with 20 years in view and plan their expenditure accordingly. To bring about changes in their expectations causes much discomfort and even distress, so any relief that is given will be difficult to remove later.

7.30 pm

It is worse than that because many institutions are anxious to see people trading up or being overhoused. Only last weekend I saw an advertisement that offered people money to trade up as a good investment. People were being told that they should not be satisfied with the house that they had when they could get something better; as long as they had a basic house partly paid for, they were being encouraged to think of buying a better house because of the investment opportunity that would create. One of the last things we want is that people should be overhoused when manufacturing industry is in such decline.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that if the housing market is to progress and more first-time buyers are to come in, more houses at the bottom of the purchasing scale are essential? If there were additional basic allowances for ordinary people in the south-east, Manchester or any other area, that would increase mobility in the rest of the market.

Mr. Sheldon: Of course, mobility is not helped by the present system. A very dear friend of mine moved from London to near where I live in the north-west. What he got for his modest house provided a magnificent house in the north-west. Now he needs to return to London. It is easy to make the transition from a modest house to a splendid house, but it is much more difficult to move the other way. In addition, the type of house that that family left originally is now well beyond its means. So mobility has not been made easier, although it is required because of the attractions of the south-east. People advocate greater movement between north and south, but movement is limited because of the changes made by the Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock was right in saying that the Prime Minister is proceeding in this way because of Tory votes. Shortage of houses still remains a problem. We are on a treadmill where year by year house prices will rise as tax relief becomes more attractive. Let us consider the total amount that is spent—£5 billion to encourage people to live in houses that more than meet their needs. If that amount were spent on manufacturing industry it would provide an incentive of about £1,000 per worker per year. We must compare investment in the housing market with the incentives that are being denied to manufacturing industry.

We must also take account of the rate of increase in tax relief as an incentive to people to buy better houses. Only two years ago mortgage tax relief amounted to about £3·5 billion. Three months ago it was £4·75 billion. Now it is £5 billion. No doubt it will rise to £6 billion and £7 billion. At some stage a halt must be called because it will take a long time for the 20-year mortgages to work their way through the system. It is not a sensible use of resources to spend money in that way.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I have listened with interest to the two speeches on the amendment. My sympathies lie more with the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald), the official Opposition Front Bench spokesman, than with the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). A serious problem is being drawn to the attention of the House. The hon. Lady said that the concession to upper rate taxpayers costs £1 billion a year. I wish that the figure was less.

I support a phased arrangement whereby tax relief would be restricted to the standard rate, but it is a peculiarity of our Parliament that we cannot argue that case. There may be logical reasons for that somewhere, but they have escaped me. It is a shame that we cannot arrange a debate about an amendment that we wish to put forward.

Although the alliance defends the principle of tax relief for mortgage payments, as we have made clear, some aspects of the present arrangement are totally indefensible. A person earning £14,000 a year may take on a mortgage. Indeed, we respect the advantage given to people by the current system. If that person gets promotion and earns £40,000 a year, what is the effect on his mortgage relief? Under the present arrangement the help given to him in hard cash terms, pound notes in his hand, more than doubles.

The Government may regard it as proper and reasonable that a man earning £40,000 a year should get twice as much help towards paying his mortgage as someone earning £14,000, but on grounds of decency and justice or any rational approach, I find that a distortion of reality, sense and good reason. Given the opportunity, we shall seek to change the tax relief system so that relief is restricted to the standard rate, recognising that the change will have to be phased because of the point made by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne about mortgages covering a 20-year period.

I take issue with the right hon. Gentleman about his assertion that massive differences in house prices in the south-east compared with the north arise because of income tax relief. There are massive differences between the south-east and the north, as there are between the south-east and everywhere else. Sometimes I find the north-south argument difficult to understand. I was brought up to regard Exeter as being in the midlands and Bristol in the north. For economic arguments I regard myself as being in the north, but I do not accept that the differences in prices are purely and simply a reflection of the tax relief system, although that cannot help. The differences in prices are a reflection of other things which the debate on this amendment will not allow us to argue about now.

If tax relief were restricted to the standard rate there might be an argument for increasing the limit. On the other hand, if there were no change in the system there might be an argument for decreasing the tax relief limit. If it remains at £30,000 from now to infinity, and nothing remarkable happens to inflation, the amount will, in effect, be reduced as time goes on. The alliance objects to the system which gives the better off more assistance towards purchasing their homes.

Mortgage tax relief is not new. It has existed for a long time under different Governments. I ask the Minister how he and his Government can justify a system whereby, on the same mortgage, a man earning £40,000 a year receives more than twice the assistance received by a person who is earning £14,000 a year.

Mr. Bermingham: As a member of the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, I welcome the contribution from Liberal Benches tonight. It is more than we had from the SDP Benches in Committee. However, I shall not go over old matters.

I recall what was said in Committee. I know that Treasury Ministers railed and riled and poured scorn on Opposition Members of the Committee because we wanted to increase the basic rate tax relief on mortgages above the £30,000 limit.

I was somewhat amused, if not tickled, to read in The Guardian today that the Prime Minister has been reminded —I do not know whether it is the thought of having to retire to Dulwich—that ordinary human beings need to live in houses. As a Member representing a northern constituency, I do not necessarily go along with the proposition that the housing problem is greater in the south of England. The problem is as great in certain suburban areas in the north as it is in the south. One can hardly buy a one-bedroom flat for £30,000 in London—not only in the posher areas, such as Belgravia and Eaton Square, but in areas such as Chalk Farm, Camden, and so on, where houses are being refurbished.

A person buying his first house or flat becomes part of the housing chain. Because of family needs, people sell and move to bigger homes. That releases another first-home property on the market. Increasingly, buying a property is out of the range of the ordinary man in the street. Not everybody in the City of London works in the commercial sector and earns £20,000 or £30,000 a year.

Let me give the example of a secretary, earning between £8,000 and £10,000 a year, and her husband—perhaps he is a manual worker or is in a semi-skilled occupation—who earns about the same. Probably, that couple can obtain a mortgage of only one and a half times their gross income. I am aware that building societies are scrambling to offer loans of two and a half times a couple's joint income, and so on. However, it is all very well to offer such a loan, but the potential strain on families at that level of borrowing is great. There is an enormous strain to meet the mortgage commitment if the wife or husband falls sick or if they seek to have a family, thereby losing one income.

Even with a basic tax relief of 29 per cent., a £30,000 mortgage is a considerable weight on the shoulders of such a family. Even if it bears interest of only 10 or 11 per cent., the repayments are about £3,000 a year—£60 a week—gross. Then the 29 per cent. is taken off. If my arithmetic is not fast enough and if I get the figures wrong, I am sure that hon. Gentlemen will assist me. The amount payable would be about £47 a week. That is before the capital repayment and rates are considered. An enormous strain is placed on a family whose joint income can be as low as £14,000 or £15,000 a year.

That is only one side of the coin. However, I am a realist. I accept that house prices rise as the years go by. I dealt with conveyancing matters when I practised as a solicitor. There is a tendency to calculate when giving advice. I am sure that hon. Members who are solicitors would agree. One calculates what the tax relief will be at 30 per cent., 40 per cent., and so on, on a £30,000 mortgage. One always arrives at a monthly cash flow figure—what a person can afford to pay per month towards his housing costs. There is an incentive, as a person's income rises, to look further up the market.

I disagree in part with what my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) said. One element—it is not a major element—that forces house prices up——

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Mortgage relief is only one aspect. There is the capital gains tax and the abolition of schedule A. It is those, together, that have made property for one's own residence purposes the most attractive investment that one can make, on a scale that is difficult to justify.

7.45 pm

Mr. Bermingham: Either I have misunderstood my right hon. Friend or he has misunderstood me. I do not disagree about the investment factor. I agree that housing has become an attractive investment proposition. Its track record since 1968 has shown that. At that time, there was a boom in house prices both in the north and south. In 1968, one could buy a semi-detached house for £3,000. By 1970, or 1971, the price had gone up to £4,000 or £5,000. By about 1973-74, the figure was approaching £7,000.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Does the hon. Gentleman suggest that his party wants to make buying one's own home a less attractive proposition than it is now? In what way does the hon. Gentleman's party seek to make it less attractive?

Mr. Bermingham: I have known the hon. Gentleman in a professional capacity for many years. I am amazed at his almost immature—I say that as kindly as I can—approach. Of course we do not seek to dissuade people from bying houses. On the contrary, we seek to assist them to buy. What we are saying is that, in terms of capital gains tax, the purchase of a house over the past 18 years has undoubtedly been an attractive investment. It has kept ahead of inflation levels. In fact, at times, it has risen startingly higher. We saw that in the 1974 property boom and we saw it in some parts of the country in the late 1970s and early 1980s.

Although an aspect of capital gains tax has led to the escalation of house prices in certain parts of the country, I do not think that that is the primary reason for high prices. The reason is that most people want to improve their housing as the years go by and as their family needs increase.

There has been a scarcity factor in the housing market. That factor often commenced in the starter houses and escalated up the scale. Unless there is mobility in housing—availability of housing—so that people can go up, and unless there is a broad enough market——

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne) indicated assent.

Mr. Bermingham: The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who is a former housing Minister, nods—I hope in agreement with what I have said. Unless there is availability of housing, there is no way that prices can be kept under control. If there are only two nice, five-bedroom houses in a town and 40 people want to buy them, that will escalate the cost. If there are 40 houses, that will not escalate the cost.

Mr. Gow: I agree entirely with what the hon. Gentleman said about the supreme importance of improving mobility. Does the hon. Gentleman not understand that his party refuses to contemplate the form of the private rented sector and, notably, any removal or diminution of the twin evils of rent control and security of tenure? The failure of his party to accept that possibility of reform means that a great deal of property remains unused or underused. If that reform came about, that housing would be brought into use and would increase the stock of housing available.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I hope that the hon. Member will resist the temptation to get into a general debate on housing.

Mr. Bermingham: I never thought that I was going down that road. I was considering the taxation aspects. The taxation aspects are reflected in our housing policies. Perhaps the Treasury, with a little wisdom in its sack of knowledge, will bring a bit of pressure to bear. After all, he who pays the piper usually calls the tune. I realise that if I were to reply to the hon. Member for Eastbourne I would trespass on the breadth of the debate. The hon. Gentleman and I have a fundamental disagreement on the philosophy behind who should rent and on what terms and conditions.

I agree that the rented sector is part of the general aspect, but it has been a decreasing sector for a number of years. Indeeed, I am told that the rented sector has been on the decline since before 1914. There must be a rented sector, and the quality of rented sector housing must be as high as possible, but perhaps that argument can be left to another day.

I return to mobility and scarcity, which come well within the scope and ambit of the amendment. If there is a shortage of housing, house prices escalate. That is as true at the top of the scale as it is at the bottom of the scale. One of the tragedies of the last few years has been the fall in the number of starter houses. In the late 1970s I was a member of a city council that tried the experiment of building for sale. It was a partnership idea, involving local authority land and local builders. Starter houses were, in a sense, only partly built. One or two rooms formed the basis of the house and rooms were added to it as families grew in size. It was an enormously popular scheme, but it was discouraged, and it was yet another aspect of starter housing that fell by the wayside.

If we increase the availability of houses, by means of starter housing for young people, builders will be provided with an incentive to provide the next stage. One might call it Barratt developments, mark 2, as opposed to Barratt developments, mark 1. Once again the purchaser must be able to meet the price.

I understand from what I read in the newspapers that the Prime Minister has begun to think about uprating. But I must never believe anything that I read in the newspapers, though they are usually told before the House of Commons is told. It is called the Lobby system. Let out the leak, to begin with, then firm it up with a couple of others, preferably by colleagues making speeches halfway round the country, and suddenly it becomes the official party policy of this or that party. That is what the present Government do, and they always seem to do it just before the summer recess so that hon. Members have no opportunity to comment on or criticise that policy. I may be over-suspicious but we are approaching the long recess and the mortgage question seems to be the first stage of such a policy.

If we were to assist young couples, the starter buyers, by increasing the relief for interest limit to £35,000 at the standard rate of income tax, we should stimulate the market. However, we could stimulate that market even more. The arithmetic is quite simple. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) said that the total amount of tax relief for higher rate taxpayers is £1 billion. If one is earning between £40,000 and £60,000 a year, I suppose that one can afford to spend a little more on housing.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) rightly said that it is obscene that persons earning £40,000 a year are entitled to more tax relief than persons earning £14,000 a year. If we were to take away £1 billion from them, it would not mean much to them. During the last seven or eight years they have had enough incentives. They have been given everything. We should say to them, "Look, chaps, you really have had a good whack. Your top rate of tax has been brought down, all the other little perks have been added in and you have done all right by this Conservative Government, so how about a genuine sacrifice? You are to lose tax relief at the top rate. You can have it only at the standard rate."

I can think where to put that £1 billion to help very many homeless people. What about the housing sector? If £1 billion were invested in housing many jobs and many fresh starts would be created. Perhaps the tide in the diminution of fresh starts could be turned again. If I may be allowed to make just a small plug, I represent a constituency which has a large glass industry and also a large brick works industry. Many jobs have been lost in both industries. If £1 billion were to be invested in the housing market, it might just produce a few jobs in St. Helens.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying again. This is a comparatively narrow amendment dealing with relief for interest. He must address himself to the amendment.

Mr. Bermingham: I apologise if, by promoting a constituency interest, I have strayed from the amendment, but the point is made.
